A WONDERFUL CAPTIVITY.

A True Story.

BY CAPTAIN R. M. HENDERSON.

AMONG the multitude of incidents which make the history of the settlements of this country, no are so interesting as those which are connected with the capture of the little French girl, Frances Bloom, who, for more than half a century, remained unknown to her friends.

As my mother knew, the great massacre in Wyoming Valley, by the Indians and Tories, took place in July, 1781. For many months after, the settlements were exposed to danger. The wandering bands of Indians started into the valley, like so many wolves, that one or more persons, as the case might be, and hurried back into the wilderness, before the pioneers could rally to punish them.

Just four months after the great massacre, a party of Delaware Indians steadily entered the valley and made their way toward the residence of Jonathan Bloom, where some of his children were at play in the yard. One of the daily struggles fought up a precipitous slope Mrs. Bloom came out and begged this not to take the child, as he would be unable to keep up with them. Rather singularly, the Indians dropped the little Indian and carried up the child, little Frances, only five years old, who was trying to hide under the stairs.

The mother begged, in the most piteous tones, that little Frances might be spared, but the captives were returned, and hurried off. The last sight which Mrs. Bloom had of the baby girl was when she was in the arms of the heavy negro, reaching out her shaggy hands toward her, and crying, "Mamma! mamma!"

That sorrowful picture never faded from the memory of the mother through all the years that followed.

There were three Indians who committed this outrage. The first was seen at hand, and as alarm was quickly given, the captives made haste to the mountains, that a vigorous and persistent pursuit resulted in nothing.

Could the parents have been assured that their darling child was dead, it would have been an insupportable relief, for all anxiety would then have ended. But the belief that she was alive, that she was a captive among the savages, that she was playing for her mother, to whom she was attached as her own, so appealingly when called away, kept the grief of her father and mother to fresh and poignant, almost, on the death-day when she was snatched from them.

About a month later, Mr. Bloom himself, while at work with a couple of Indians, was seized by another band of Indians, who killed his father-in-law and wounded his nephew. The latter succeeded in reaching to the fort, where he gave the alarm, but the Indians were beyond reach before any pursuit could be made.

Thus it came about that Mrs. Bloom, in the space of a few weeks, lost her father and husband, beside the other friends. She was almost heart-broken over her afflictions. She married her husband, who was one of the best of men, but the time he was gone to his reward, and that, all in the time, she would give him.

There remained her two children, but time would not smooth her to the loss of little Frances. As the weeks, months, and years passed, the wound still lived and refused to heal. In her sleep, she saw the pale-faced warrior, rushing away toward the mountains, while her darling Frances still clung to her arms over his shoulder, and, with terrified looks, called, "Mamma! mamma!"

Thus, passing, pleading wife, was now clinging to her son, and that supple, figure was now before him. Somewhere and within reach, she knew Frances was living, and across the unknown space, through the long miles of wilderness and gloom, came the feeble voice begging assistance to come and take her to her arms.

Mrs. Bloom was blessed with faithful and affectionate children, and her son became a prominent business man. They shared in the sorrow of their mother, though it is not to be supposed that girl was as day as home. But they were tenderly attached to her, and more than anxious to do all they could to set the burden of grief which was weighing her to the earth.

In 1876, years having been fully established, one of the most noted Magazines, and talented business men among the Indians gathered there, offering liberal rewards for any information of the lost child.

These investigations were so thorough, that at the end of several weeks the beleaguered back home, almost convinced that the girl was dead. Some years had passed since she was taken off, and her the sorrowing mother anxiously scanning the faces of those captives, in quest of her little Frances, as she remembered her. Days were spent in this sad work, and among them all, the cherished and mourned child was not found.

It is not unlikely that at this very time, Frances was at no great distance from her mother, and could have been produced within a few hours.

The grief of the parent was such that her affectionate sons were more than willing to do the almost in their power. In 1876 the time had happened some one day to be as kind to my poor little Frances."

The wall stood several weeks, but finally went away, and no more was seen in hand of her.

All that the many search of the mother came to an end. She and her devoted sons had spent thousands of dollars, and had traveled hundreds of miles in quest of the child and her son, and now the answering parent answered to her grief and years the boy alone on her feet, and surrounded by her weeping relatives, quietly finished her last.

It was on May that she died, twenty-eight years after her child was torn from her arms, and carried away by the Indians.

"We shall meet by and by," said the good woman, as the shadows of death gathered around her; "my baby shall be returned to me, but she is not yet ready. She is still on the earth, and, my dear boys, never give up the search until you learn her fate."

Was judgment made by the stars, and, a few days later, the body of their cherished parent was placed in the grave.

Twenty years later, that is, in 1896, Mr. Joseph Bloom and his nephew made a long and arduous journey to Upper Canada, but in the end by learning that a converted chief had a white wife, who they had some reason to suspect was Frances. They were convinced and moved with great hospitality, but quickly learned that the woman was not their sister.

It was now thirty-eight years since Frances was taken away, and during that time the best had gone on. It would seem certain that, if the woman were living, some time must have been gained of her. On the contrary, not a single clue had been discovered. The Indians were therefore fully warranted in coming to the conclusion that their sister was, and had been, dead for many years. They had certainly kept their promise to their dying mother, and had spared neither money nor labor in promoting the search, which was without the first shadow of success.

The anxious heart was ended; they decided that it was utterly useless to hope for tidings of the lost one, and the inquiry was left to the last great day, when everything should be made known.

In the years more passed, and the captivity of Frances took its place among the legends of the sanguinary history of Wyoming, which is marked by more extraordinary incidents than any episode in the settlement of our country.

And yet Frances Bloom was alive, and, as we have noted, was among those in the very neighborhood in which the search was pushed so persistently by her. More than thirty years of these efforts, but close to keep up of the way, for her long residence among the Indians had transformed her into one of those people in every respect except that of blood. Perhaps, after all, it was fortunate that the weary, sorrowing parent and her child were not, the circumstances being as they were. With all her afflictions going out to the lost Frances, the poor mother could never have known the child it would have cost her to find the sweet child changed to an Indian square, with the strongest dislike for her own race and everything pertaining to civilization.

In the month of January, 1898, Colonel George W. Irving, in the employ of the Government, was dispatched to the West on business connected with the Indians in that region. While there engaged, he approached one of their villages on a branch of the railroad, and, as he was about to enter, he was hit somewhat ill, he applied for hospitality, which was cheerfully granted. He was not to an Indian dwelling, the most respectable in the village. During a night's stay, he lay down in the corner of the room where the Indians were. He was a white man, and, after all the family had withdrawn, excepting the old woman who was the head of the family, he slowly entered her countenance.

The more he did so, the more he became convinced that, despite her surroundings and dress, she was a white woman. The old woman spoke the Indian tongue fluently, and finally got the question directly to him.

She answered him readily, and he was not surprised when she admitted that she was of white the slightest trace was gained of her. It would seem that if she were still among the Indians, the reward would be certain to bring forth the desired result. And yet, despite their failure, Frances was alive at the time, and, beyond a doubt, many of the Indians who denied all knowledge of her, could have taken the brothers directly to her Indian home.

But the mother sadly shook her head when her sons assured her that Frances must be dead. She would not believe her darling had left the earth until the most unquestionable proof of the fact.

In 1876, ten years after the capture of the little girl, the Indians spent several months among the Indians and agents in the West, offering a reward of five hundred dollars for any information of their sister's whereabouts. Not the slightest information was obtained. The following year, Mrs. Bloom, now an old woman, went to Tingo Point, where a large number of Indians were assembled to make a treaty of peace with Colonel Powers. Many white prisoners were brought in, and one may imagine spent the entire summer in traveling among the various settlements, offering liberal rewards, and visiting many Indians, women, and Indian agents in their service. Whenever they heard of a white female captive (and, unfortunately, they were not lacking), they examined into her history minutely, but without gaining the first particle of knowledge of the lost one.

About this time, a young lady learning of the search for the girl, and believing she might be the missing one, made her way to Wyoming, and presented herself before Mrs. Bloom. She told she was taken by the Indians, when a very small child, from some place among the Sierras. She could not recall her name, but she hoped she might be the one who was wanted.

One searching look of the mother told her that this unfortunate was a stranger; but her heart went out in sympathy to the poor girl, whom she told to stay with her as long as she pleased.

"This is welcome," said Mrs. Bloom, "and you

Lost in the Wilds. A Sequel to "Up the Tappan." By COLLO SPENCER, JR.

CHAPTER I.

Those who have followed me with the reading of "Up the Tappan," need scarcely be told that an enterprise undertaken in high spirits had come to a most successful, if not single, ending. Ned Livingston and Harry Norwood, employees and friends, who left Philadelphia on the steamer Rotterdam some weeks since, were wrecked near the mouth of the great Amazon in the summer of 1882. The vessel was so injured by the charge of a mad whale, that it went to the bottom, compelling the crew to take to the boats.

The two boys, being separated in this fashion, Jack Brockley, a student sailor, took them in charge, built a raft, on which the three kept afloat until picked up by the steamer Explorer, which started up the Tappan, one of the principal tributaries of the Amazon.

It was on this memorable voyage, marked by many serious adventures, that Harry Norwood was made captive by a wandering band of Indians and carried off. Having been attached to a small tribe in the woods, the facts and their friend Jack Brockley were obliged to separate in the depth of the night, and attempt to creep through the forest of giant trees which they were surrounded.

Wonderful scenes attended them, but it was the sad fate of Harry Norwood's friends to stand on the bank of the Tappan and see, in the distance, the steamer making their way northward, knowing the last was in their company, although kept from view. The day was closing in a storm when this sight was observed, and, a few minutes later, darkness closed in, and the young friend vanished from sight.

What was to be done? There was conversation and dinner in almost every hour. Jack Brockley, the sailor, and Ned Livingston had been in Brazil long enough to know that all the steamer was against their own saving the day again. The wonderful beauty of that country was almost impossible to the white man, and many of the Indians are fierce and warlike. The prospect of searching successfully any band of savages into these wilds seemed hopeless indeed.

But, on the other hand, there were those persons at least who would never consent that the boy should be abandoned; these were Jack Brockley, Ned Livingston, and the Portuguese guide, Capataz. Capataz, who had charge of the little steamer, was greatly depressed by the misfortune which had overtaken his young friend, but neither he nor any of his crew were able to do anything looking toward his rescue. The last duty of the officer was to the steamer, even had he been able to see a means by which he might have reached the youth, to whom he had become strongly attached.

In such a crisis as this, the hopes of the party centered on Arthur, who possessed such an extensive knowledge of the country and its inhabitants. He had obtained a good view of the Indians, and spent them with such a care that others could not.

"To what tribe do they belong?" asked Ned

Livingston, when his friend shared a disposition to discuss the matter.

"At first I thought they were Manducos, but I am sorry to say they are not."

"Why?"

"You know the Manducos are friends of the whites, and, if it had been they who took the boy, he would not have been kept long, and he would be in no danger of injury or torture."

Ned Livingston turned pale, and asked, in a tremulous voice:

"Do you mean to say that—"

"Oh, never! there is danger of his being put to the death!" There is not a more dangerous people in all South America," was the alarming answer.

"What sort of creature are they, my way?" asked the sailor.

"They are strong, active, and ferocious; they have only the rudest kind of clothing, and wander over hundreds of leagues of territory; they are fond of fighting, and more of them are found along the Amazon than the Manducos. They are the Indians who have long made the navigation of the Amazon so dangerous."

"How can we get Harry out of their hands?" asked Ned Livingston with great anxiety.

But hold! I believe you intend to turn westward and go up the Amazon after leaving the Tappan?"

"That is my purpose."

"Have you decided how far you will ascend the river?"

"Not positively, but more than thirty I will go to."

"That better half may prove more the question," said the Portuguese. "We will strike the mouth, and, if Heaven permits, we will penetrate and we reach the mouth of the Madeira. On the northern bank of the Amazon, near that point, is the small Indian village of Kana. You will reach it in ten or six days. The distance you will have to go is more than twice as great as our route, and, if we ought to see this thing within a week, can you wait there for it? You should arrive here?"

"I will be only too glad to do so," replied the captain. "I will stay there as long as you wish."

"After making Kana, hold on a week. If you see or hear nothing of us at the end of that time, you may climb us from your thoughts."

"That will be impossible."

"The journey across the country is less than two hundred miles. If we cannot make it within a fortnight, we shall probably never make it at all."

"You may now look," suggested Capataz Spengler, interrogatively.

But the guide shook his head again, in a way which seemed to express with little hope of ultimate success.

"If we make the mistake we shall, of course, we will never return."

"For with you then," said Jack Brockley, heartily. "No, to my thinking, it will be as safe to push on as to turn back."

"So it will, when we are once in the country of the savages."

"The more I will never be content to give it up," added Ned, with great excitement, "no long at there in the least ground to expect success."

The party continued far into the night, and, when they came to the shore for shelter, the proposition, still may be settled, had been fully determined upon.

Whether it was to reach its object or inevitable death remained to be seen.

CHAPTER II.

In the early morning of 18th, our three friends went into camp in latitude 22° west from Greenwich, and longitude 5° south. If any reader will locate this point on their maps, they will find that it lies to the northeast of the upper Tappan and less than one hundred and fifty miles from the junction of the Madeira into the largest tributary of the Amazon, with the parent stream.

Three days had passed since Arthur, the guide, Jack Brockley, the sailor, and Ned Livingston had parted from the captain and crew of the little steamer Explorer, which was plowing down the Tappan, preparatory to ascending the Amazon to the half-way town of Ego.

In this time, our friends, having crossed the Tappan on a raft, had made some reconnaissance. They had penetrated far into the country of the dangerous Kana, and were now south of their way to Kana, the wretched little Indian town, where course, you may as well know the truth at once; and there is nothing small of this of your own seeing this again. Nevertheless, I shall never rest until something possible has been done."

But Jack Brockley and the boy attended their hands to the guide, who pressed them warmly, the latter was more anxious than he to do his utmost for the missing man.

"To the east of us," said Arthur, pointing west and the Atlantic, "is the country of the Portuguese. They are a wild, wandering tribe, who sleep in hammocks and are as treacherous as snakes. Their principal hunting grounds are in the neighborhood of the headwaters of the Amazon. To the south are the Manducos, who may be called farmers, as they till the soil and are of an industrious disposition."

"Do you think they are the men who have Harry?" eagerly asked Ned Livingston.

The guide shook his head.

"Impossible! the Indians who have taken away your friend belong to the Kana tribe."

"What about them?"

Arthur shook his head.

"I cannot tell."

"But as you have some hope," said Capataz Spengler, "you must have a plan of penetration. What do you propose?"

"There is but one thing we can do, no, nothing stronger. Jack and myself will start to the north-west through the country of the Amazon in quest of the boy."

Just then the guide saw the back of considerable disappointment on the face of Ned, and he made haste to add:

"I mean, of course, the three of us," nodding toward the youth, whose face instantly brightened up.

"We will follow the Amazon as far as we can."

"Suppose you arrears them?" asked the captain.

"We will try to reason Harry, but with little prospect of success. How likely we shall get into a fight and be made to share his fate?"

"And you'll do nothing?" asked the captain.

"Nothing more than give us your best wishes."

CHAPTER II.

In the early morning of 1883, our three friends went into camp in latitude 22° west from Greenwich, and longitude 5° south. If any reader will locate this point on their maps, they will find that it lies to the northeast of the upper Tappan and less than one hundred and fifty miles from the junction of the Madeira into the largest tributary of the Amazon, with the parent stream.

Three days had passed since Arthur, the guide, Jack Brockley, the sailor, and Ned Livingston had parted from the captain and crew of the little steamer Explorer, which was plowing down the Tappan, preparatory to ascending the Amazon to the half-way town of Ego.

In this time, our friends, having rounded the Tappan on a raft, had met some disappointment. They had penetrated the basin the country of the dangerous Arawaks, and were now south of their way to Kanaui, the wished-for Indian town, where course, you may as well know the truth at once; and there is nothing small of this of your not seeing him again. Nevertheless, I shall never rest until something possible has been done."

"THE YOUNG MEN HAD BEEN THE SUBJECT OF OUR PARTICULAR NOTE."

But Jack Brockley and the boy attended their hands to the guide, who pressed them warmly, the latter was more anxious than he to do his utmost for the missing man.

"To the east of us," said Arthur, pointing west, and the Atlantic, "is the country of the Parakanas. They are a wild, wandering tribe, who sleep in hammocks and are as treacherous as snakes. Their principal hunting grounds are in the neighborhood of the headwaters of the Amazon. To the south are the Makas, who may be called farmers, so they till the soil and are of an industrious disposition."

"Do you think they are the men who have Harry?" eagerly asked Ned Livingston.

The guide shook his head.

"Impossible! the Indians who have taken away your friend belong to the Arawak tribe."

"What about them?"

Arthur shook his head.

"I cannot tell."

"But as you have some hope," said Capataz, smiling, "you must have a plan of penetration. What do you propose?"

"There is but one thing we can do, no, nothing stronger. Jack and myself will start to the north-west through the country of the Arawaks in quest of the boy."

Just then the guide saw the look of unfeigned disappointment on the face of Ned, and he made haste to add:

"I mean, of course, the three of us," nodding toward the youth, whose face instantly brightened up.

"We will follow the Arawak as far as we can."

"Suppose you mistake them?" asked the captain.

"We will try to reason Harry, but with little prospect of success. How likely we shall get into a fight and be made to share his fate."

"And you'll do nothing?" asked Ned again.

"Nothing more than give us your best wishes."

Lost in the Wilds. A Sequel to "Up the Tappan." By COLLO HERRING, JR.

CHAPTER I.

Those who have followed me with the reading of "Up the Tappan," need scarcely be told that an enterprise undertaken in high spirits had come to a most successful, if not single, ending. Ned Livingston and Harry Norwood, employees and friends, who left Philadelphia on the steamer Rotterdam some weeks since, were wrecked near the mouth of the great Amazon in the summer of 1882. The vessel was so injured by the charge of a mad whale, that it went to the bottom, compelling the crew to take to the boats.

The two boys, being separated in this fashion, Jack Brockley, a student sailor, took them in charge, built a raft, on which the three kept afloat until picked up by the steamer Explorer, which started up the Tappan, one of the principal tributaries of the Amazon.

It was on this memorable voyage, marked by many serious adventures, that Harry Norwood was made captive by a wandering band of Indians and carried off. Having been attached to a small tribe in the woods, the fate and their friend Jack Brockley were obliged to separate in the depth of the night, and attempt to creep through the forest of giant trees which they were surrounded.

Wonderful scenes attended them, but it was the sad fate of Harry Norwood's friends to stand on the bank of the Tappan and see, in the distance, the steamer making their way northward, knowing the last was in their company, although kept from view. The day was closing in a storm when this sight was observed, and, a few minutes later, darkness closed in, and the young friend vanished from sight.

What was to be done? There was conversation and dinner in almost every hour. Jack Brockley, the sailor, and Ned Livingston had been in Brazil long enough to know that all the steamer was against their own seeing the boy again. The wonderful beauty of that country was almost impossible to the white man, and many of the Indians are fierce and warlike. The prospect of searching successfully any band of savages into these wilds seemed hopeless indeed.

But, on the other hand, there were those persons at least who would never consent that the boy should be abandoned; these were Jack Brockley, Ned Livingston, and the Portuguese guide, Capataz. Capataz, who had charge of the little steamer, was greatly depressed by the misfortune which had overtaken his young friend, but neither he nor any of his crew were able to do anything looking toward his rescue. The last duty of the officer was to the steamer, even had he been able to see a means by which he might have located the youth, to whom he had become strongly attached.

In such a crisis as this, the hopes of the party centered on Arthur, who possessed such an extensive knowledge of the country and its inhabitants. He had obtained a good view of the Indians, and spent them with such a care that others could not.

"To what tribe do they belong?" asked Ned

Livingston, when his friend shared a disposition to discuss the matter.

"At first I thought they were Manducos, but I am sorry to say they are not."

"Why?"

"You know the Manducos are friends of the whites, and, if I had been they who took the boy, he would not have been kept long, and he would be in no danger of injury or torture."

Ned Livingston turned pale, and asked, in a tremulous voice:

"Do you mean to say that—"

"Oh, never! there is danger of his being put to the

"There is not a more dangerous people in all South America," was the alarming answer.

"What sort of creature are they, my way?" asked the sailor.

"They are strong, active, and brave; they have only the rudest kind of clothing, and wander over hundreds of leagues of territory; they are fond of fighting, and more of them are found along the Amazon than the Manducos. They are the Indians who have long made the navigation of the Amazon so dangerous."

"How can we get Harry out of their hands?" asked Ned Livingston with great anxiety.

But hold! I believe you intend to turn westward and go up the Amazon after leaving the Tappan?"

"That is my purpose."

"Have you decided how far you will ascend the river?"

"Not positively, but more than thirty I will go to."

"Then better half way point across the continent," said the Portuguese. "We will strike the mouth-west, and, if Heaven permits, we will penetrate and we reach the mouth of the Amazon. On the northern bank of the Amazon, near that point, is the small Indian village of (Manducos). You will reach it in ten or six days. The distance you will have to go is more than twice as great as our route, so we ought to see that there is no risk. Can you wait there for us if you should arrive late?"

"I will be only too glad to do so," replied the captain. "I will stay there as long as you wish."

"After making Manducos, hold on a week. If you see or hear nothing of us at the end of that time, you may climb us from your thoughts."

"That will be impossible."

"The journey across the country is less than two hundred miles. If we cannot make it within a fortnight, we shall probably never make it at all."

"You may now look," suggested Capataz, interrupting.

But the guide shook his head again, in a way which seemed to express with little hope of ultimate success.

"If we make the mistake we shall, of course, we will never return."

"For with you then," said Jack Brockley, heavily. "No, to my thinking, it will be as safe to push on as to turn back."

"So it will, when we are once in the country of the Manducos."

"The more I will never be content to give it up," added Ned, with great excitement, "no long at there in the least ground to expect success."

The party continued for hours the night, and, when they came to the shore for dinner, the proposition, which may be called, had been fully determined upon.

Whether it was to reach its object or inevitable death remained to be seen.

Lost in the Wilds. A Sequel to "Up the Tapes." BY HOLLIS ROBBINS, JR.

CHAPTER IV.

As it was indispensable that the persons should keep their presence unknown to the forest Indians, the persons began moving down stream, until they reached a bend, where the flowing place of the Indians was favorable.

It was considered important that they should cross without delay, for, as one of the wild men had taken the boat with a short time before, there was the possibility that he might do the same again, and discover the whites near him.

All necessary that was to be avoided, and the way preparation was, therefore, adopted.

The stream was deep, swift, and almost of icy coldness.

"These will make me safe," said Arlene, coming in a step-down to the water. "I will take to being to get through water together to that or over-land?"

To his astonishment, the guide at that moment discovered a canoe possibly similar to the one which the Indians had used a brief while before. It was lying close against the bank, well above up, beyond its being moved down by the current, and a long, double paddle lay within it.

This was a fortunate discovery indeed, though it was alarmingly suggestive to the persons of a dangerous neighbor, where they were the like to come in collision with the forest Indians at any moment.

The boat was so small that, like the one to which the guide referred, it would carry only two of them. As the further shore appeared to be the most proper, Arlene decided to take Jack (Blacky) across down, and then to return for Ned.

A careful scrutiny of the boat failed to show anything ominous, and Jack (Blacky) stepped carefully into the craft and sank down in the stern. The boat was made of the bark of some tree, and was so buoyant and narrow that the utmost care was necessary to avoid having it over.

Arlene dismounted his gun and knelt in the middle of the canoe, caught up the paddle, and then sat down in the stern. He managed the boat with great skill, and speedily placed Jack on the other bank, at a point nearly opposite that from which they started.

Not much waiting, his manipulations with an Indian's assistance, the forest Indians gave no matter of the art of managing such a delicate craft.

At the moment the guide was on the point of setting out on his return, he stopped and, looking across to Ned, harshly motioned him to step back. He did not call, but gestured with every evidence of excitement. The youth hesitated a moment, wondering what it could all mean, since he had not seen or heard anything unusual.

He waited also that Jack (Blacky) withdrew, so that he could, as he observed, although Arlene remained standing by his canoe, with the long paddle in his grasp.

It was useless to conjecture what it all signified, since that could do nothing but wait for the explanation.

A few minutes later the boat returned with the other shore, and landed near the bank where Ned Livingston, seated on the ground, awaited it. Arlene gave no evidence of excitement or agitation, but advanced steadily across the bank, with a steady, as though he were making the simple exercise it gave his limbs.

Ned Livingston was fully watching him with the same admiration he felt before, when he was startled by a rustling just below him, and he caught a dim glimpse of some moving body.

He turned like a flash and made a most startling discovery: a large, heavy Indian was standing forward toward the bank, with his gun fixed upon the white man in the canoe. The Indian was watching him so closely that he had failed to observe the youth, who, it may be said, was almost at his elbow.

The savage was a frightful looking creature. He was naked, except at the loins and the feet, the latter being covered with a rude kind of moccasins. His mouth was locked as if it were closed, and Ned, however, from the way it shone, that it was. His hair was long, black, and matted about his head, his chin was ing the finest kind of a target for the forest Indians.

The latter halted, when to go any further would reveal him to his victim, and prepared to shoot the white man through the body.

He suddenly snatched his right hand over his left shoulder and drew out of the long arrow from the pouch and then into the hollow end, grasped it in his other hand, and then the Indian, gathering himself together in a crouching position, pointed the weapon through the bushes at the man in the canoe.

He was able then to see it upon some of the rag-

CHAPTER V.

THE aim of the forest, with the poisoned arrow, was better than that of Ned Livingston, with an American rifle, and yet the white man failed and the boy succeeded in hitting his target.

The youth of warning was not in the midst of the youth, when Arlene suspected the nature of his peril, and stepped to the bottom of the canoe, like the lion, which dodges the bullets of the hunter the instant he sees the bait.

The guide could not know the point whence the arrow would come, not had he the time to stop and breathe. He knew it was aimed at his body, and he took that body out of its path with a quickness so great that the eye scarcely could have followed it.

At the second of things, a slight thud was heard. He raised his head and saw the arrow on corresponding side of the canoe; these marked the track of the poisoned arrow, which had gone through the craft as though the latter were made of cardboard, and had sunk to the water beyond.

The sharp exclamation of Ned Livingston's rifle broke the silence at the same moment. The youth failed to kill, but, dazed as it was, he felt that self-protection demanded it; but, in his excitement, his aim was poor and his bullet passed through the fleshy part of the white man's fore arm.

Unquestionably the wound was painful, but the flight of the projectile was unobtrusive. He uttered a shriek, like that of a wounded tiger, and sprang straight up in the air, falling back and rolling over in a position hardly of harm.

Ned Livingston moved with the smoking gun in his hand, prepared for the worst, and appalled by the belief that he had actually slain a human being. He forgot that the wounded forest was likely prove a more dangerous foe than his assailant, or when informed by pain, and the youth made an attempt to withdraw, or retreat his weapon.

But Arlene, the guide, did not forget it. With almost the same quickness that he dodged the missile, he rose again, plunged the paddle into the water, and drove the canoe, like an arrow, toward the spot where came the shriek.

The instant the canoe struck the bank he leaped out and made a plunge for the struggling savage. Nothing could have proven the personal courage of the Portuguese more than this. He supported there were several arrows on the spot, and a more dangerous encounter was necessary to save the boy.

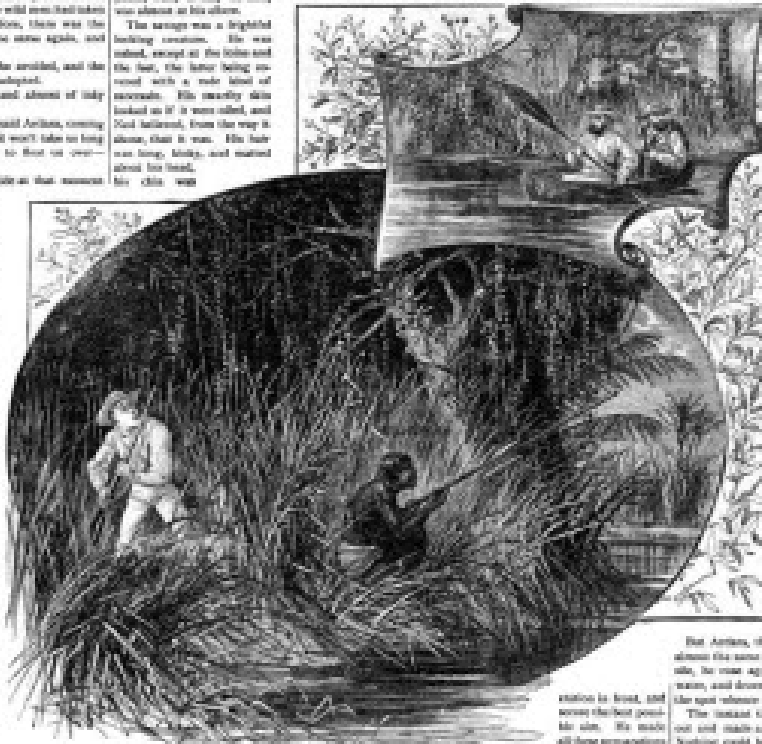

Catching sight of the club, with which he lay on the ground, Arlene threw himself upon it with such violence that it was borne bravely backward; the long, hollow end which answered for a gun was snatched from his grasp, and the forest Indian, whose in the guide's white hand, his bow-drawn to place, was withdrawn before the frantic savage could reach it. He was disarmed and made helpless in a twinkling.

The sight of the two figures on the ground brought Ned Livingston to his senses, and he ran forward to see whether he could give any help to his friend. He saw at once that Arlene was master of the situation.

The continued signs of the Indian proved to the guide that he could not be severely hurt, but the sight of blood on his arm explained why he was so terrified.

"Be quiet, and I will not hurt you!" commanded Arlene, in the language of the savage.

The forest made no answer except to struggle harder, but a minute or two was enough to show pointed citizens with shots or arrows, and a black, tattooed man ran down each side of his respective boat. His features were rugged and hideous almost beyond description.

"LOOK OUT, ARLENE! THERE'S AN INDIAN COMING AT YOU!"

Ned Livingston had scarcely time to take in these characteristics, when he observed that the white man, carried a long and in one hand, while a bunch of arrows was slung over his shoulder. He was one of the savages who used the poisoned weapons, which had been so fatal to the Indian-gatherers some days before.

The action of the forest showed that he was preparing to launch the terrible missile against the Portuguese, who was rapidly approaching the shore upon which the canoe was beached.

The fire was only a few rods before Ned, but somewhat close to the stream, so that the youth could watch his movements with little danger of being detected, unless some noise should lead the Indian to turn his head.

The position could not have been more favorable for shooting the Portuguese, who was sitting in the middle of the canoe, with his chest and head offering an obstacle to his enemy's aim.

Ned Livingston was transfixed. It was as if he were watching in the grasp of some terrible victim of death. He could not move or speak while the first part of the dreadful preparations was going on. He realized the awful horror of the situation and the frightful death which awaited Arlene, but he was unable to raise a finger or his voice in his behalf.

But, by a supreme effort of the will, he regained mastery of himself at the end of a few seconds, and pointed his gun in turn toward the white savage, just as the latter brought the end of the cord to his mouth for the purpose of blowing the poisoned missile into the body of the guide, who at that moment was no more than fifty feet distant.

"Look out, Arlene! there's an Indian aiming at you!"

There was the words which escaped the agonized Ned Livingston, at the very instant the forest pulled out the deadly arrow with incredible force, and the youth himself pulled the trigger of his rifle.

But the Indian aimed his bow, and the boy didn't.

A STREAK OF GOOD LUCK.

BY MARY A. CROFTON.

I never saw one should itself—and travel, too, in our own glorious West. The mountain money denotes the soul and courage in its atmosphere. There is a strength in the fire of the night vision, which is in some measure commensurate itself to the heart of him who looks upon them, making his life's course long with something of their own wild freedom and power. Give me Nature, as she exists in her grand and noble, and let the same motto of human truth take care of themselves.

I shall never forget the day I made, at a time when I was much younger, and a little more untried than now, in the home of my friend Bob Wilton in Oregon. He was of my own age, almost, and we were previously allies in our tastes.

Bob's father had settled there three years before the time which Mr. Wilton owned being near the Columbia River, and within reach of the great mountains, that they reminded me of so many inquiries made always passing down upon the new settlers as if it was what they were about. They were up very early in the morning, these great mountains were—and as up late at night, too; for the moon showed them at their best, and they were almost level of watching.

"My!" exclaimed Bob, "I'm glad you're come. Won't you have me with you now? And I've got one of the best stiffs on the river, besides. Why, all around here it's just alive with salmon and wild game—quack, quack, quack—land, look, look! in every stream and pond. You can't go wrong—they're everywhere. Even on the wilderness on the Columbia so thick that they dashed the air when they flew. As a thick cover, it would seem as if the whole river were coming up—water, mud and all. Oh, you better believe I make you run right down into them when I catch a couple of changes of duck and shot up among them."

This was just the kind of excitement that I like; but a girl must be looking for me as it is most happy.

"And what of the house and warden and pasture?" I asked. "Do you ever worry of time?"

"Oh yes! I shot a big old wolf last winter, right at the back of our barn. She came after one of the young steers. She chased the steer twice around the barn—so greedy that she didn't notice me—and when she came around the second time, I let her have both barrels. She ran about twenty rods and dropped dead. What a long, long thing she was like a great stuffed dog."

"Oh, George! a stirring life they lead that boys-and-girls-ness!" I replied, smiling. "And the reader may feel assured that my enthusiasm for Western life was not shared by the reader. This was the kind of game for me!"

"There are lions in the mountains, too," continued Bob, "but I have never killed one. Mother is afraid I will get hurt, and I don't like to give her occasion, she'd try for the fellow."

"Grinps, I suppose."

"Yes, real big grins; some of them as don't weigh about hundred pounds. You wouldn't think a bear would walk as much—they look smaller, but they are wild, I tell you. There is a bear that some of the fishermen have seen that is half white.

They kill only for the hunters, but they have never destroyed any of ours, though one day I saw the tracks of a tiger on our land, in one of those sandy places where the wild pigeons come for grain."

I had brought my double-barrel with me, and it was arranged that next day we should go out and see what could be done among the wild game. Bob showed me his land and little skill, and early in the morning we started for an afternoon's work, having with us water and food, and no end of ammunition.

A number of good shots, yet doing nothing extraordinary.

All about us was a dinner, which had been carefully provided by Mrs. Wilton. While I was looking at a great "holding" of wild game at a little distance in the woods, and Bob said that it would come from some creek or pond among the trees.

With all the silence of those western woods, excepting upon an owner's name, we made our way toward the spot.

Land and land was the words—look, look, look, till the whole air was bright with the birds, wild cries.

"My goodness!" whispered Bob, as he got sight of a small forest pond. "Look!"

I did look and was astonished. Geese, geese, geese! The place was full of them—just upon the water, upon the shore, and it did not seem as if they could have been so had we talked even in loud tones, their own noise was so deafening. How beautiful they were, too, with their bodies gleaming with white.

We brought upon game and in doing from the right-hand barrels, then, as they rose, the left. The slaughter was progress, and without reloading, we rushed to secure the wounded ones that were flapping off into the woods.

Through reeds and grass, through alders and mud and water, we rushed in pursuit.

Bob had just knocked over a disabled bird with the barrels of his gun, and I had one by the neck, when a sound that fairly froze the life within us passed on like thunder close to our ears!

I got a glimpse of some thing rushing among the reeds—something big and terrible—partly white and partly black, and with a wide mouth open for its full career.

In trying to escape, I fell flat, but rising again in an instant, at the same moment Bob's excited shout, "It's a giant bear!" told me what a scrape we had got into.

The animal had one of our guns under its paw, and was ready to charge upon us with us—indeed, he probably considered his own "personal possession" as the prize of his to get it.

We ran back for a good distance, but the bear was too much loaded with the wounded geese to follow us. Finding that the attempt did not prove the advantage we now stopped to reload.

"That's the worst animal I ever killed one of," said Bob—"half white and half black, and I believe it's a female bear with cubs, too. I'm sure I saw a funny little one when I was a little black and white fellow. It also has two or three cubs, and they are nearly like the mother, the cubs, the man I kill you of, will give a hundred dollars apiece for them. I guess he'll give that for a close white one."

Bob was wonderfully good, but he was a very brave bear. As to myself, I was thinking more of the mother than the cubs, and wondering when she would come roaring after us.

BOB WITH A STAFF AND A BIRD.

I've known a grizzly generally has a little white on the fore shoulders, but this one, they say, is marked just as if it were painted—half white and half black, the same across the back. There is a man in Idaho, the nearest town, that says he would give a hundred dollars apiece for cubs so marked; but I guess nobody knows whether this old bear is a male or a female."

"Ben and Clark saw one on their expedition that was entirely white," I said. "But I think a white grizzly must be as rare as a white blackbird. Dear me, I wish we could get a good responsible old bear, white or black!"

"To do it," said Bob, "that then our folks would worry about me if I should go among the mountains, and the bears are too shy to come out here looking for me. Sometimes it was a beautiful scene that we landed forth upon. The Columbia flowed strongly and smoothly along, and there were mountains from bordering the stream, while from some spring Canadian passed over the forest and down into the boat in our midst as we were going, and what we intended to do.

The waterfowl, however, were more shy than I had expected to find them. They had been made the subject of note by the hunters, and generally gave us a wide berth.

Our first shot was at a flock of ducks, at a distance of about fifteen rods; but our guns were good, and we brought down seven of them.

"Not a bad beginning," said Bob. "We'll have some before night."

We kept on all the forenoon, making a

A FRIEND THAT WAS TRUE.

BY HENRY B. COOPER.

"Here was who lives in the country," said Mrs. Anderson, "couldn't keep a dog without one, but I would not do it again, such a dog is not only a nuisance, but is really of much value actually, as one may say, when we have no other company about the premises."

"You have one at present, then, of course, I should guess," was my remark.

"Oh, yes," she said, "and one of them came to me in a very singular manner. They are Anna's dogs, both of them. She is now seven years old; and the larger and more so for one so young, delighted to get her on her hands, when she will sit down, clinging to his hair. I tell my husband that he ought to make her a child—indeed."

"And so Anna, the natural love is intense," I said. "Oh, I know very well how it is with children and dogs; there is a wonderful position the affection they feel for each other. Not a bit of selfishness—in them?"

"But an idea!" said my good friend, with animation. "Every dear little Anna! But I would not put the whole story."

"Yes, I pray you! Nothing else so interesting as such little home incidents where children and dogs play a perpetual game."

"Well, then," resumed the lady, "I begin with the beginning. Anna, as you know, was born most often we attended in California. She was always a very old-fashioned child, and if possible more fond of pets than children. In general, she had three little kittens that grew up to adult age only to be succeeded by others as pretty as they—though, indeed, we couldn't keep all kittens that came to us in the course of nature, but she had my account of dolls that had a funny way of exchanging dresses with the kittens. But she herself said little puppy, as nothing satisfactory in that line had happened to fall in our way."

"But dog when she was three years old, she had grown out to play near the house with her own full of business and affairs. As my husband stood close to the door, I always kept a good watch, when she was out to see that she did not get too near the water. This dog, however, I must have looked off from her a little too long, for she was suddenly missing."

"I ran out—down to see what had become of her, when I detected a graying animal beyond the bank, and during in that direction, caught a glimpse of my little girl's golden hair just as it was disappearing under the water."

"The shriek I uttered was almost morbidly loud—I knew it must have seemed so—because my mother had heard it, and into a depth of more than twelve feet, of course, I swung for my child. Oh, yes, the dog is in danger at that place and the current is often rapid."

"Anna had been caught as far from the bank that I felt short of air and was instantly under water. I was, only to stick again. While up, however, I was conscious of clashing at some living object, most one which I knew was not my little girl, though just what it was I was too much confused to comprehend."

"My next recollection is of finding myself on the bank with my husband attending alternately to Anna and me, and a large wet dog standing next to."

"My first thought was of Anna."

"She is coming all right, said my husband, and for the next three years we were often thinking of getting her a pretty puppy as an addition to her family of pets, but somehow it never seemed to come in our way to do so until her sixth birthday had come around."

"Then upon that very day, her father brought her home a perfect beauty. He had happened to be in the village a few days before and reserved it for a birthday present."

"I never saw a child so delighted! From morning to night the new pet was in her arms or tumbled in his dog fashion at her feet. I must say that her dress and pretty red stockings suffered as they had never done before; but I did not begrudge the time spent in meeting, she was so happy at times got noticeably shaken up by the new favorite, who in spite of repeated warnings from his mistress, would go galloping about the room with some one of those dragging tails his mouth."

"One day, when we had had Carlo for about two months, Anna and he started one morning for their accustomed walk, as father, being in the village after Anna, so usual, putting the matter in the light of a very important visit to very important people, who, of course, were invisible to any one but himself."

"She was dressed as for a real 'excursion'—a hat, vesting a new bonnet and carrying a cane, which she held very jauntily, as far as Carlo would permit her to do; although his constant nibbling at her scarlet stockings induced some and restraint from the dog's tail."

"I was long about the house, but I could see how Mrs. Jones at least the whole way as she went along under the great trees that shaded the path. I wish also were here to tell you in her child's way of what occurred to her, and what she thought and did by the road as well as after she got there; but as she is out I will describe her as well as I can."

"She talked to Carlo all the way, trying to make him believe, and telling him of all the wonderful things she had ever heard of that had happened to people when they were naughty."

"She was seated on the 'benches,' with Carlo at her feet, and was just hurrying him upon his usual behavior while sitting, when she was suddenly conducted by a monstrous dog that came exactly around the great pine and stood regarding her with what seemed a very intelligent curiosity."

"Her first thought was one of intense alarm, not only for herself but Carlo, and catching the little pet in her arms, she drove herself away to the further end of the bench with one knee drawn up and the top of her other knee just touching the ground."

"She kept Carlo as far from the big dog as possible, although the latter, however, not shaking her fears, made more than one effort to get away from his mistress, and always acquiescence with the dog's violence."

"With the intensest steady looking at her, his tongue protruding a very little, as if he had forgotten to take it in upon entering the premises and his lungs followed, two sparkling with good nature."

"Then Anna began to notice that, in spite of his large proportions, her unassuming color was remarkably handsome. He was mostly black, but had a band of white about his neck, extending down on the breast and fore legs, and up to the top of the head, making it between the ears in a very distinctive manner."

"She saw that his eyes were pleasant—a child is quick to notice such things—'they hand. 'You were never drowned, then, she said, 'but it has been a wonderful deliverance.'

"He then carried us into the house, and as soon as my senses were sufficiently recovered to understand him, he told me that Anna and I owed our lives to the great dog I had just seen."

"As I was running straight at your eye, he said, 'I saw the dog just pulling Anna upon the bank, and then before I could get to the spot, he turned and swam to you, pulling you up shore in the same way.'

"But I don't know," I said, "I don't know," I replied my husband. But the dog was gone, and it was impossible to find him."

"Then I knew that it was that had gone swimming past me while I was in the water. He had intended that to the child as if knowing her to be the most helpless. It was just as if he had said, 'The mother if I can, but the child is all right.'

"Well, for days and days I thought of that dog, wondering where he could have come from, and feeling almost as sorry that he had gone off without further recognition, as I should had he been a human being who after such a service had disappeared suddenly to avoid of my thinking him."

"Anna, as I have said, was three years old with her little sister Carlo, that could be all described up like a piece of rubber as if he had not a bone in his body."

"There is one spot which has always been a favorite haunt for me. It is only about a hundred yards from the house, so that I frequently went there to sit in the cool shade while I read some book or was engaged with my needlework. For reasons which will presently appear, however, I have not been there of late."

"My husband, in his capacity of carpenter, made me a rustic seat at this spot, under a great pine-tree which formed an impenetrable contrivance against the rays of the sun, though I presume it would have let the rain through."

"Anna and her pet were always with me upon the occasions described, and quite of her she would visit the rustic retreat alone, as it was within call of the house, and there seemed no danger to be feared."

MY DEER HUNT.

BY HENRY W. WILSON.

One crisp, frosty morning, a trapper on the North Fork of the Sacramento, away up in the North Land, brought down a deer as it was flailing by him on a dead tree. Killing a fine deer the spot, he signalled to his companions, and an hour later the party was enjoying a rich, substantial and nourishing feast.

On the same day a company of amateur sportsmen, as they termed themselves, who had left Sacramento City, California, a short time before, returned, lading with them the carcasses of these deer as trophies of their success. To the astonishment of them all, New Mexico, several similar exploits took place, and I think it was about the same date that I engaged in a memorable deer hunt in Florida. I refer to these disconnected incidents to show how widely distributed in the American deer. Away up on the snowy wastes, toward the Arctic circle, in the depths of the northwest and in the embowering heat of the southern swamps and thickets, this beautiful animal is found and is hunted for its meat.

And no hunter is better known. Every boy reader of this paper has seen a deer and possibly some of them have shot one, or two of the specimens which are often mentioned and used as goals in the huge games of the old West. And yet, well known as is the animal, it is quite rare in some characteristics that are not familiar to all.

A deer which lives in the highlands never attains the splendid proportions of one that makes his home habitually in low, swampy regions. In summer, he is of a deep red color, and his flesh is not fit for food. In winter his coat is a grayish-blue and his meat is royal. You all know how great a delicious venison is and how few of us are able to have it regularly on our bills of fare.

The American deer, as a rule, reaches his horns annually. These horns are usually shed during the months of May and June. The young are born near the same time, and the doe has the extreme faculty at that period of going out at once, so that the horns are unable to follow her. This is mentioned as a successful provision of nature, but while nature was at the business, why did she not extend the maturity to the deer as long as it lived? I think that would have been beautiful indeed, and if the matter was explained in the deer, he would agree with me.

The bucks are magnificent specimens of beauty and strength. There are down many a time to admire these remarkable creatures.

When I did so, I made sure I was up a tree as beyond reach of his "know of ignorance." Quite frequently the bucks will look home to their mother, plunging, racing and pushing each other until both fall from exhaustion. More than once have such combats been fought between males, with the victor triumphantly looking down on the vanquished. These fights, however, have been observed only in such antagonists have been found months and years after. Suppose such a result should override a couple of hours when fighting? Suppose after looking over, they couldn't resist them, and their parents, with no thought of their weakness, should not wait to find them. How great would be the shock of finding them with arms folded together, and dead from starvation and thirst!

Instead of the sweet smile which ought to linger around the mouth of all good boys they would be related into misery, maybe as you would be blackened and some hair pulled out. How bad the parents would feel! Let this be a warning, boys, not to run such a risk.

But how I am wandering from my story. I have been engaged in many hunts for deer. Somehow or other I have shot many. Once or twice, when I was in the north of a heavy to finish the game, he has made a hunt for me and narrowly missed finishing me. One of the most times I ever met was—

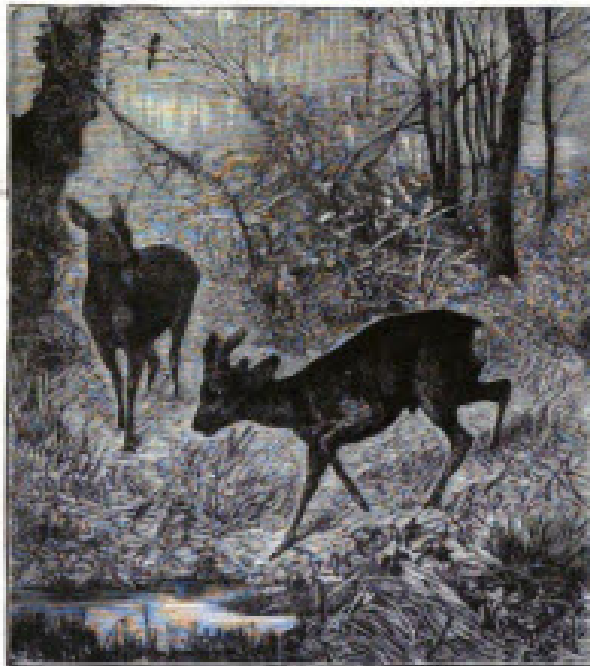

"A stag at bay is a dangerous foe."

What time is accurate, as I know from experience.

When we set out we had with us an excellent horse, but he vanished so utterly before it was noon, that we found that some villain had reared up and swallowed him. It turned out, however, that he became so disgusted with us, that after going a short distance he turned about and went home. I really couldn't blame him.

Hopkins and myself tramped through the timber until the sun passed the meridian. Then we sat down on a fallen tree and ate our lunch, while his final shot-in-law had put up for us.

"As you are going hunting," one said, with a twinkle in his eye, "you must take along some food to keep from starving to death."

THE DEER WAS AT THE MOUTH OF THE POOL.

Wilson Hopkins and myself started out on a deer hunt last winter in central Florida. We were visiting his brother, whose home, properly speaking, was south of the center of the State. To the southeast stretched a wide expanse of thicker land in which deer were sometimes found, though they were by no means numerous. Wilson told me he had spent four or five days hunting for the animals without catching sight of so much as a tail.

To the northwest stretched a high range of hills, while swamps, lakes and wet lands could be found in any direction. Florida is not coldened for its cold weather, and though it was in the very depth of winter when we started out, the temperature in the middle States would have been considered only stirring weather for us now in spring.

Wilson did not notice the irony of this remark, but I did.

"See here," said Wilson, after we had finished our lunch, "we ain't hunting the right kind of way."

"I thought we were following the most scientific style," I replied, "for we haven't seen any game, and there isn't any prospect of our doing so."

"I'm there in," he remarked, raising his lips and shaking his head, "what we want to do is to climb."

"I expect to climb the deer fairly; as soon as we have a chance of course each will take one."

"No, no, no; what's the use of trying to do any more stupid than nature has made you? What I mean is that you should take your time and I the other. Then if you want my say game you can make it run toward me, and if I drive out any I'll set you on a run toward you."

"In that case the animals will meet and each will turn about and run back; then we'll get the game we started, which will be fair. But suppose that neither of us start any game—what then?"

"What then?" repeated Wilson, with a wondering look, "why, nothing, of course."

"I'll be that way, so I'm willing to try your plan."

After we had separated and were doing our best to creep out the brilliant scheme originated by my friend, it struck me that we had entered upon it in such haste that some inconvenience was likely to arise. Nothing is easier than for a person to go astray in the woods, and I was convinced that, when each moved out on the circumference of the immense circle which was intended to bring us together by nightfall, some time likely we would not meet again until we did so at the house of our friend several miles away.

Subsequent investigation made known the following interesting facts:

Wilson tramped about two miles when he became tired. A big porcupine, he thought, he set down to rest.

"I think that fellow over yonder with the gun," said he to himself, "is the most stupid fellow that ever pretended to know anything about hunting. He was actually referring to me. The hunt's any more serious than to play through the woods till sundown, so I'll continue to sit on this log and smoke my pipe, and let him drive the game up to me."

And he sat still and smoked.

I think it must have been a little before that moment that I began to feel tired. I was thirsty, and could not get myself off a feeling that I hadn't eaten enough dinner; but, as there wasn't any left, nothing was to be gained by musing over it.

"The fact that my man who started out with an overbearing companion to hunt deer, would propose that they should separate and try to make the game toward each other, is proof that he who proposed it is a first-class idiot," I said to myself, as I looked back at a beautiful little pool of water; "and I might as well add that the other fellow who acted on the proposal was as big a fool."

I haven't met any one who disputes this position. The small pool looked so tempting that I knelt down and drank my thirst from its crystalline contents. That done, I walked back a rod or two and sat down on the ground with my back against a tree.

"As Wilson intends to hunt the deer out of the bush and drive it toward me," I reflected, "it wouldn't be proper for me to go grubbing through the undergrowth and waiting it away; so I'll wait here till the game comes."

I told my rifle across my knee, leaned my head back, and in order to think over several matters, I closed my eyes. I am afraid I fell asleep.

It was near the middle of the afternoon when I awakened and looked around. It took a minute or two before I realized where I was, but I was still sitting with my head against the tree; my hat was off and a dense curtain of huge ferns was crawling through my hair and clothing; the ground upon which I was sitting felt so cold and damp as ice, and I had suspected that despite the chilly while on the other hand, Julia's stature, robustness, and content-like cast make her appear to be a natural sort of the comic.

When the train had proceeded about two miles from the station, the men, the women, the children and the dogs were ordered to get up and formed a line that preceded it on all sides. The members of the train guard moved in groups, and quietly, methodically and in the way, but beyond these, were military formations, holding like spears in the distance, who scanned the plains in search of enemy men, but they well knew that when the Indians were detected to be numerous, not only the train advance but also the train itself was able to take on a trail whenever a good opportunity presented itself.

These appeared and disappeared on the horizon quite frequently, and made signals move with the advance guard, as they were supposed to be good swimmers, and when he sat on the plain, he pointed to a distant object, and telling Alfred to keep by him, set upon his journey, and went off several times.

There were more within four or five hundred yards of the strange objects, which were hovering over them a large band of vapors, as

On seeing the fishermen approaching, every animal stopped grazing and stared at them in the most inquisitive manner. Not being satisfied with what their eyes revealed, all commenced wagging because if they could do, just stop wagging by their color; but as the wind blew from the opposite direction, this resulted in no help.

5. Being a characteristic of most wild animals to retreat backwards as approach is closer than persons on foot, especially from the forward, the animals get within two or three hundred yards of the head of the party before they begin to display any signs of unusual alarm.

It hardly dawned upon them that the strange, alien, approaching might have some sinister designs against them, and as soon as they got that idea into their heads, they huddled together for a few moments, their feet as hot as their souls. They perceived almost vividly, stirring, acute as life, how they were grouped together as enemy to their masters, which were badly changing when they attack each other, looked like a flock of lions.

"When they had got fully started, feet shivered. "Give your horses a few min.; let them leap, roll and dash, and take them forward."
"All right," was the answer; and both dashed after the other horses.

The boys now took back to the wagon-meat, and on reaching it they were severely reprimanded by one of the men for going so far ahead of the column; but when Jack told him their reason for doing so, there was a general expression of satisfaction: the idea of the man's month's labor, and his looking at his companions with an expression which could be plainly as read: "They know what they are doing, and I am not going to interfere with their judgment."

They began left the line to bring to the shore animals, and when they returned the line crowded round to take a look at the trophies, for the majority of these land animals were a rarity. Those who had knowledge of hunting were lost in their praise of the animals, in particular in which the animals were killed, at the various land game reserves, through all of these, and also through the branches or merged at the two divisions. It was evident, at a glance, that whoever had killed there was no error in the business, and this made the hope appear more certain.

The only disaster they had with which to make the firm was the dry string of buffaloes, generally known as buffalo chips, which was fresh scattered over the plains. This gave out a fair amount of heat, and little smoke, and when perfectly dry, burns freely. All the people scattered in places of the wagon, and this was the first time that many of them had lived for two months.

John and Alfred were assigned to the area provided over by an immigrant named Hester, as he had the local provision supply of consumable stores, and had a small number to provide for, his family consisting only of a wife, a daughter about sixteen years old, and a son a few months.

FACING THE WORLD;

The Haps and Blisings of Harry Kane.

By ROBERT H. HARRIS, Jr.,
author of "The Haps and Blisings of Harry Kane," "The Haps and Blisings of Harry Kane," "The Haps and Blisings of Harry Kane," etc.

CHAPTER IV.

A young man's story.

It was an anxious moment for Harry as he stood waiting the disappointed captain, whom it would affect the situation of the engine. It did! The engine, though not understanding the meaning of the sign, not knowing indeed, but it might be a boy's fault, probably landed it, and sweeping the engine, stopped the train within a short distance of the place of danger.

"Thank God!" exclaimed Harry, breathing a deep sigh of relief.

The engine stopped from the train, and when he looked ahead he saw no engine.

"My boy!" he said, with a look of surprise, "you have saved the train."

"I am glad of it, sir. My heart was in my mouth, but you should not see my sign."

By this time the passengers, whose curiosity had been raised by the accident, began to pour out of the cars.

When they saw the watchman, standing near the engine, and in the open field, while some of the passengers of the engine were looking at the watchman.

"We were not aware of this, sir!" said the engineer. "It was he who stood on the fence and signified that we were not to proceed."

One of the passengers, who had seen the boy, and who had seen the engine stop, said:

"A small man, somewhat poorly dressed, but very up to the mark."

"What is your name, my boy?" he asked, looking at Harry.

"Harry Kane."

"Where do you live?"

"In Cambridge, sir."

"When did you discover this accident?"

"Not over ten minutes ago."

"And where did you get your sign?"

"In the yard of my father's house."

"You have shown wonderful promptness and presence of mind. Probably you don't know me?"

"No, sir."

"I am the president and leading stockholder of the road, and my property has some very fine being the child of me. Goodness, how the president loved to the group of gentlemen around him. "don't you think his boy deserves a testimonial?"

"Yes, yes!" cried the gentlemen in chorus.

"So do I, and I'll lend off with a subscription of twenty dollars."

"Harry's another twenty!"

"And here's ten!"

"Here's five!"

He saw other gentlemen following the president, each himself making the same ten-dollar, and gathering the contributions in his hat.

"Well, sir!" said Harry, as soon as he had heard what was going forward, "don't reward me for what was only my duty. I should be ashamed to accept anything for the little I have done."

"You may want it, little to save the lives of a man full of people," said the president, "don't you see a slight value upon our lives and limbs. Are you rich?"

"No, sir."

"No! I thought. Well, you wouldn't be ashamed to accept a little testimonial of our gratitude."

"Let me do my share," said a young lady, "and I'll be glad to do it."

"Certainly, miss," said the ladies, "let me do my share."

When all was disposed had contributed, the president handed the pile of bills to Harry.

"Take them, my boy," he said, "and make good use of them. I shall see you a considerable balance, for I value my life at more than twenty dollars. Here is my card. If you ever need a friend, or a service, call on me."

Then the president gave directions to the engineer to run back to the preceding station where there was a telegraphic office, from which messages could be sent in both directions to warn trains of the watchman.

Though it has taken me considerable time to narrate this incident, the time consumed was very brief, and Harry was left with his hands full of money, hardly knowing whether he was richer or poorer.

One thing seemed to him only that he gave the owner of the telegraph.

"My name is Harry Kane."

"Do you live round here? I never heard the name before."

"I've just come to the village. I'm going to live with John Fox."

"You don't say! Do you say his to be?"

"Not very near. He's my cousin."

"But you don't say. Well, I hope you'll like him."

He spoke to rather a delicate tone. Harry smiled. He had already made up his mind.

"You don't say! Do you say his to be?"

"Not very near. He's my cousin."

"But you don't say. Well, I hope you'll like him."

He spoke to rather a delicate tone. Harry smiled. He had already made up his mind.

"My name is Harry Kane."

"Do you live round here? I never heard the name before."

"I've just come to the village. I'm going to live with John Fox."

"You don't say! Do you say his to be?"

"Not very near. He's my cousin."

"But you don't say. Well, I hope you'll like him."

He spoke to rather a delicate tone. Harry smiled. He had already made up his mind.

"My name is Harry Kane."

Harry entered the shed and sitting down on a log, took out the bills, which he had hitherto stuffed in his pocket, and began to count them.

It is not necessary to detail the counting. The sum total is what we want to get out. It was large enough to amuse and gratify him.

Though a majority of the bills were small, there were many of them, and the aggregate sum was two hundred and eighty-nine dollars and fifty cents.

The fifty cents had been dropped into the bag by a child.

But Harry retained the ten dollars given to the owner of the telegraph, as would have within fifty cents of three hundred dollars.

CHAPTER V.

Harry's letter home.

"Almost three hundred dollars!" murmured Harry, joyfully. "It has been, indeed, a lucky morning for me. It has nearly doubled my property."

The question arose in his mind, "Should he give this money to Mr. Fox to keep the train?"

But his grandfather had a son, like Mr. Fox, and he would have had no hesitation in giving this money to his hands. But he had formed a poor opinion of John Fox, apart from the unfortunate accident, he had heard of him, and was beginning to be sorry he had come into his hands.

"No," he decided, "I won't give him this money. I won't even let him know I have it. Where there could be no harm in it. He could not very well carry it about with him all the time. Moreover, it would be dangerous. It is better to put it in a secure place, that would answer, but should Mr. Fox learn that he had a deposit anywhere, he might be provoked, and even to visit it. On the whole Harry felt pleased to have what to do with his suddenly acquired wealth."

"I wish I had asked the president of the road to take care of the money for me," thought Harry.

"It would have been safe in his hands."

Still unsatisfied, one hour walked across the railroad tracks, and began to look about him. In one corner he noticed a little wooden shed, black with soot, not more than a foot long, and six inches deep, which was apparently unoccupied, having been thrown out of a window. It was locked, but a small key was in the lock.

As this struck him, he would suggest this mysterious trunk (which was his, and deposit his wealth therein. He could not think of it as a mere curiosity.

Opening the trunk he found it empty. The lock seemed in good condition. He made a pile of the bills, and depositing them in this receptacle, locked the trunk and put the key in his pocket.

Now for a place of concealment.

Harry came out of the shed, and looked warily around him. Not far away was a steep elevation surrounded by trees. Without any definite idea, Harry, by a hard, ascended the elevation, and from the top had an extended view of the neighborhood.

This, however, was not what he wanted. The hill was of a gently formation, and therefore dry. At one point near a railroad track, one saw detached a rocky, made either by accident or design. Its location near the track made it easy to discover.

"Why not hide the trunk here?" he said to himself.

The more he thought of it, the more he liked the idea. It might not be a good place, but it was a place, and he would not let it go to think of another.

With a little labor he crawled and deepened the hole, till he could easily store away the box in the crevice, then covered it up carefully, and showed himself down over all to the place of concealment.

"There that will do," he said, "in a time of need, let Mr. Fox find it if he can."

He had reserved for possible need fifteen dollars in small bills which he put into his some small share of the money, as an acknowledgment for the use of his property.

"Here, William," said Harry, when he had extracted his steps to the house, "in your telegraph, for which I am much obliged. I saved the train."

"Well, I'm thankful! Little did I ever think a telegraph would do so much good. Why, it only cost you a dollar and a quarter."

"Show me to my acceptance of this bill to pay you for the use of it."

"Little matter! Why, you've given me ten dollars!"

"It's all right. It came from the passengers. They gave me something like."

"How much did they give you?"

"I don't know yet," answered Harry, "but it is enough to gratify the curiosity of the good lady."

"Did they say this money was for me?"

"No, sir. I am sure they would think you ought to have it."

"Well, I'm sure I'm very much obliged. Ten dollars! Why, I haven't had so much money in a long time."

"You can buy a new telegraph."

"No, I won't! The old one will do. I'll buy me a share in West Virginia. I haven't had since I was married. You didn't tell me just now."

on that subject, but did not care to take a stronger line in confidence.

"I hope so," he said.

"If he knows you've had any money give you, he'll want to take care of it for you."

This consideration had not occurred to Harry. Indeed, he had for so short a time been the possessor of the money, of which he did not know the amount, that this was not surprising.

"Well, good morning!" he said.

"Good morning!" It was a lucky morning for both of us. Harry's boy better see how much money you've got!"

"Not now. I'm in a hurry."

Indeed, Harry had some curiosity as to the subject himself. He was not quite sure whether he ought to have accepted money for the service he had rendered, but then the president of the road thought it right, and now he was in his own case that he would have liked to do something for a person who had saved his life. So he explained his example, and determined to accept thankfully what had been showered upon him.

"I must go somewhere where I can count this money undisturbed," he said to himself.

Not far away he saw a ruined shed. Now it were the chance of finding of a house that had once been a house. The shed had not been much injured.

CHAPTER I.

"Well, Dave, it was a close game, but we managed to win our money after all that talk," said Tom Manning, referring to a baseball match of the previous day.

"Yes, but thanks to our lucky stars that Fred Worthington was with us. If John Bedford had kept him at the store, as I was afraid, we should have been badly beaten."

"He didn't play the whole game, did he?" asked Tom, curiously.

"Of course not," returned Dave Worthington, with some warmth, "but you know very well we should have lost it, if it had not been for him. If he could not have been there, why not be here and give him the credit of it, as I am sure he would not if the case were reversed."

"Well, I didn't say anything against him."

"So, but you don't expect to say anything for him."

"Why should I be so unreasonable in my praise?"

"Well, I can say fairly that his playing was equal to that of some professionalists that I have seen. The fact may have enabled him to get the best of his pitching and the best batters looked really very well."

"Don't you want some credit for catching?" asked Tom with a view to turning the conversation from Fred.

"Yes, but—" here the conversation was interrupted by the sudden entrance of Matthew De Vere, a member of the club.

"Indulge," declared he, who showed some clearly by his manner that he considered himself the "well known man" of the town. There was a certain marked tone about his brightly polished boots that will be shown in their proper place, without including any description upon the reader.

"Oh, boys, I have a lot of good news for you, he said, "listen what it is."

"Anything startling?" asked Tom.

"No, but it is something you and Dave will both like."

"Tell us what it is. We give it up, don't we, Dave?"

"Charles Bedford is going to have a party—a birthday party."

"A party," asked Dave; "why, who told you?"

"My sister, Andy just came from Mr. Bedford's and said so."

"What is it to be?" chimed in both boys, eagerly.

"Next Thursday evening," answered their informant.

"Well, that strikes me about right," replied Tom with evident pleasure of the prospect.

"How old is Charles, I wonder?"

"Oh, he will be sixteen next Thursday," returned Matthew.

"The glad news can be his birthday to make us up a little. I'm getting hungry for a vacation," said Tom.

"The evening is getting long and it is too cold to move about much. These chairs, I say, for Charles Bedford! I'll engage him for this first round."

The chairs were given with a will, for the next session of a party, the first one of the season, was sufficient to clarify the boys. It meant not only a good time to them, but, perhaps, what was more to their taste—the offering of baseball in seeing the girls and boys; for boys always seem to have an opportunity to admire their fathers, and I have often noticed that this method of securing their attention seems to be more agreeable to them than almost any other.

"I'll wonder who will be invited," said Matthew, and then added, with a smile, "well, I don't see who is at Fred Worthington's only one left of them. He takes to good times and about ten more for a fellow in his circumstances, and since he has gone into John Bedford's store he is within their grasp."

"I don't know why he should not be invited as well as any of us," said Dave Worthington.

"He is certainly one of the ablest boys in the village, both at his books and at whatever else he undertakes, and the fact that his father is a poor man ought not to be against him."

"And you may be certain he won't be over-looked, for he and Nellie Burton are going to be very good friends, and of course Charles Bedford will ask him on his account, if he has no other reason."

Now Matthew liked Nellie Burton himself, and, like most rich boys for his father was a retired sea-captain and President of the Maritime National Bank, could fill him the description of something which his fancy craved.

"You just wait and you will see. I don't tell everything I know."

"Fred has a big mouth, you know, and they say he can use his hands pretty freely too."

"There is no need of informing De Tom on that point," remarked Dave, "for it isn't very long since he and Fred gave a little exhibition on school."

"Come, then, tell me all about it," said Tom.

"You know better about it than we."

"I won't tell you anything," declared De Tom gruffly; "he can't put on also with me any more; and if he goes to that party and gets into trouble, he will get into trouble."

"If Nellie wants his attention she will be pretty sure to have it, for you can't fight him—he isn't easily won," remarked Dave, in a way that evinced mastery.

"I should say not," said Tom with a sly grin.

contact on their hands and the one who "kissed himself" would not be Fred either. Just wait till the party comes off, then look out for him."

CHAPTER II.

Marbleton is a good type of a New England village, showing everywhere thrift and energy. Of course it has a manufacturing industry of some sort, or it could hardly be a New England village; and the chief building of Marbleton, in this line, is a large wooden factory that employs about three hundred hands. There are also a number of minor industries, together with stores, churches and schoolhouses. It is not a large village, there being, perhaps, three thousand inhabitants all told.

Since we want a teacher, one might suppose that the people would single freely, and that otherwise would not thrive. Well, at the time of which I am writing, it did not thrive to any great extent, still it was there, and showed itself particularly in the case of the "new people."

As related, to associate with the "factory folks." Exceptions were made, however, to the head officers of the company, and the owners of certain departments of the mill, who, by virtue of their position, which brought them in a liberal salary, were practically welcomed in the town of the village.

These two branches of society had three different "sets" — that of the mill-layers, was made up, as it usually was, by the workers together of the mill in the industrial, and the better educated citizens, leaving the others to have such society connections as their opportunities afforded.

Fred Worthington's parents mingled with the latter class, for they were far from being rich. His father was a shoemaker, and earned only a small sum weekly, but through the excellent management of his wife, they had a neat and comfortable home.

During Fred's younger days, this society distinction was widely maintained, but since he had grown to be, as he considered, a young man—and, indeed, he really did possess some of the qualities befitting that name—he began to realize that there was more in him than a social difference between him.

This fact impressed him most forcibly since he found that some of his companions with whom he had grown up, played, and studied side by side in school years, were now apparently beginning to ignore him.

"Is there any reason for this?" he often asked; "have they suddenly accomplished some great thing, or done some heroic deed, the vision of which gives them distinction, or is it trouble with me? If so, where does it lie? Surely I stand among the very first in my class at school—far ahead of Matthew De Vere and his class, and some of the others that treat me so badly. I wonder if working in a store is disadvantageous? I always thought it a good thing to be a merchant. They are ever where among the most influential men."

"There always kept good company," he continued, "and never had any people with the boys, except with Matthew De Vere, just before I left school, and that wasn't my fault. I thought him a fellow, though, that I think will remember, and even when they in the town trying to pay me for it by having the girls and boys against me, but only a few of them have shown any change."

"I know my father and mother do not belong to the same set" as others, but that is no reason why they should slight me, and if that isn't so, I will work my way up and make them acknowledge me, if it takes me years to do it. But so long as Nellie Burton and some others are friendly, I don't care so much."

FRED AT NEELIE BURTON'S PARTY.

Therefore the thought that a poor fellow, like Fred Worthington, could come between him and the object of his fancy was exceedingly disagreeable.

What was one reason why he "hated" Fred? The other was, he could not find it even him, for Fred had a will of his own, as well as a perfect physical development, which showed Matthew that it was not that it would not be well to grapple with him.

Dave's remark was a sharp one, and had the effect of bringing the matter to Matthew's face, though he never failed to hide his own face.

Both boys noticed this, and Tom, who was always ready for them, even at the expense of a friend, said:

"Yes, I saw Fred with home with Nellie from Sabbath school last Sunday, and it seems to me he has to go up to her father's rather often with goods from the store. I guess the doctor will have to give a bill to pay at Bedford's, unless Fred makes two of those trips up there to carry them the night before."

But never mind, Matthew, school will soon commence; then you will have the advantage of him, for he will be in the store."

Matthew gave decidedly angry at these remarks, and said somewhat angrily:

"I'll have the advantage of him without waiting till school, you just mark my words."

"How are you going to get it?" asked Tom with rather an indifferent look.

with of Dave, "and judging from appearance, Nellie is as pleased with his attention as he is with his company."

But Matthew possessed a good share of conceit, and knowing Nellie to be quite friendly to himself, he imagined that his advantage over Fred would be so great that he could easily monopolize the attention of the young lady in question, and therefore replied with some assurance:

"There is no fear of her toying with my love, for I propose to take up her time pretty well myself," and then added in words that showed more clearly his low character, "No, boys, if Worthington should be there, he is making an unwelcome addition to the fact that he will never show himself again at one of our parties."

"We can occupy the attention of the girls, so they will leave him alone to stink into the corner and hate himself, while we enjoy the world and make fun of him. If you will only do this I shall hope he will be there, just to let all see how awkward he is in such a place, for there is some difference between a party with music and dancing, and a talk-indebted picnic."

Some other boys have joined the group and the conversation was broken off. But Dave Worthington took occasion to remark in an aside to Tom:

"If Mat De Vere and a dozen more just like him should try to keep the girls away from Fred Worthington, they'll find a big

CHAPTER VII.

The storm made a very confused attempt to obtain a night's sleep after leaving captivity, both because the night was well spent before he reached home, and because the nature of the great importance rested upon his mind to allow him to sleep in a chamber.

He reported at the dinner at the next morning home, and after working a little time complained of being sick, and got released for the remainder of the day. If he was not physically ill, he was mentally at least, as he quickly sought Matthew, and told him, with more or less of feeling, his experience in the hands of Dr. De Yere, and of the latter's demands in settlement (as he called it) for his freedom.

"And you let me out upon me?" demanded De Yere with disappointed eyes.

"I told him who you were, and gave him from asking me to death."

"Is that all you said?"

"He told me to tell the truth or not."

"So you gave him the whole story about Washington, and he told everything you knew?"

"I only told him what I had seen in my place."

"If I had I wouldn't have been an idiot," muttered De Yere, slapping his forehead.

"Oh, you wouldn't? Some folks are very smart," replied Tim, getting angry.

"I'll have been smart enough for that."

"I let you would, if he had had you as he had me, you would have told more than I did, and promised anything he asked."

"I'm not a liar, I want you to understand, to try if any one looks at me."

"No, you are very brave to have to get some one to help you get away, as you say, with Fred Washington."

"I was a fool when I got you."

"And I was a fool for having anything to do with you in this business. You will be arrested and sent to prison, and so will I unless you pay Dr. De Yere the five hundred."

"I wanted I what do you mean?" asked Matthew, looking pale.

"I mean just what I said, if you don't pay him, he will come down on us within three days."

"I told him not to," gasped De Yere.

"Yes, he did, and he was going to take me to the sheriff last night, and that's why I told everything."

"Five hundred dollars? I can't get it with me, and I don't have it."

"He would find out everything, and would have me arrested, and would have every one here all about it."

"I won't do either."

"How can you avoid it?"

"Five hundred dollars is too much."

"You'd better see Dr. De Yere and tell him."

"I don't want to see him."

"You will have to see him or send the money."

"Would he be ugly?" asked Matthew, trembling to meet the man who gave him the first and well-earned punishment.

"Probably not. He got all the revenge he wanted last night, and he wants money now."

"The two boys then appeared before Dr. De Yere and related their adventures."

"I ought to have said that five hundred," said the latter.

"How can I give it to you if I haven't got it?" asked Matthew.

"Four dollars a week, and could give me ten times as much, and not value it."

"Oh, don't tell him! I will pay you what I can."

"If you had the money I would take it and say nothing more to him or any one; but I must have it or hand you over to the sheriff. Matthew hesitated at this thought. He was in a dilemma, and hardly knew what to do."

After a good amount of talk, Mr. De Yere agreed to take three hundred dollars in the place of the five originally demanded. This, however, was not implied by the ability of a doctor to make the penalty less heavy for the boys, but with a feeling that he would get nothing if he were to take the money in the other De Yere, as he gathered from Matthew's conversation that he would run away from home rather than submit to the severe punishment his father would be sure to give him.

"Three hundred dollars," Jack agreed.

"I'll give him what he has to do with."

Clearly something must be wrong, thought the doctor, and he began to question the boy, who was going from the cell up to a warm room had grown so suddenly sick that he looked as if he would faint.

The kind physician laid him gently on a lounge, and gave him some professional treatment as the case demanded.

There is a vast difference between one who has become intoxicated by a single glass, and one who has been drinking for hours, and has thereby perverted his nerves and shattered his brain. In the former case, the liquor can be thrown from the stomach, and the victim soon recovers the power of his mind, while in the other case, it may take several days to restore his ordinary state.

This sickness of Fred's was the very first thing that could have happened to him, he is not out of his mind, he is not out of his mind to stop him in any great extent. He accompanied him. He saw at once, by Mr. De Yere's expression, that he did not know what had happened the previous night, and that he was a slight temporary relief, still, he knew it was only a question of time before his capture would mean the whole story. When the next place, what would be the result? Would he lose his place in the story? He knew that Dr. De Yere was a strong man, having little charity for the hands of others. That his clerk should have been in the hands of the previous night, would certainly not restore him, gradually.

Fred imagined that every one whom he knew knew of what he had done, and looked upon them with disgust. He felt tempted to leave the village, and never to return there again, where he had so disgraced himself. Could he only go to some new place, among strange eyes, and commence life over again, he might go ahead and work his way around, but here this shame would always hang, like a dark cloud, about him.

On reflection, however, he saw there would be both remedy and punishment to leave his parents alone to mourn his act and his shame.

No, he was the guilty party, and he must stay here, where the unfortunate consequences had taken place, and here try, by the strictest discipline, and the most watchful eyes, to regain his former standing among his friends.

As Fred thought over the circumstances of the past few weeks, of Matthew's devoted loyalty, of his conduct at the party, and his sudden friendship since that time of his temporary and momentary stay here, he was in great pain, and as he thought of the doctor's words, and his deception in so suddenly leaving him at the door. He was clearly that he had been dragged into the clutches of the Vero's revenge.

However he did not believe that a single glass of beer would have produced such an effect upon him, and so he strongly suspected the truth—that he had been drugged with a strange liquor.

Well, he decided to leave the matter alone, and not think it open to him, though there might be time to work it over. He felt confident that the truth would at some time come to light, if he said nothing about it, whereas, should he accuse his companion as an enemy for getting drunk, the charge would be at once denied, and then he would be less likely to be the guilt upon the young victim, who had made him the plaything of his malice.

He knew, also, that he was to blame for having visited the indignities done at all, and much more for allowing himself to be persuaded to indulge even in what is particularly considered a harmless drink.

He was so almost-minded during the day, and showed an anxiety in his face that was making him, that he could not deny that he had been drugged, and wondered what had happened to shake the flow of the boy's nerve.

Heard was a suspicious man, and so thought possibly something pertaining to his story had gone wrong. Since a suspicion was enough to arouse his selfish interest, for he related only in his business. He would not look beyond that, and had no feeling for others, only an occasional show of it for the sake of policy.

Whether there is such a way, is not half living. He is not kind, intelligent, liberal and self-sacrificing, but is narrowed down to a cold, grasping existence.

I often pay with me, for though they may have wealth in abundance, they have not lost to enjoy it. Neither do they possess the faculty of deriving pleasure from kindness and generosity to others.

There are men in luxury in art or science, and when they become such the greatest of these countries, they have nothing to look forward to. The life beyond is something to which they have grown in thought. They have stored their souls with that which is the highest thing, and it is dwarfed and stunted, while the collection of the pale and muddy form is marred in their comparison.

Fred's main trying ordeal of the day, was five hundred dollars—and his watch, and signed an agreement to pay the balance within six weeks. He also indicated the statement that this had signed, about the search as being true, and the useful Mr. De Yere explained it in his large pocket-book for them to see if it should at any time be needed.

CHAPTER VIII.

When Fred found himself in Dr. De Yere's house and that Matthew had disappeared, he stood still for a moment, suddenly trying to collect his thoughts and make out his situation; then, realizing some half-remembered words, he made a dash as if to leave the house.

The doctor who entered the entrance of the hall, and who was struck nearly dumb by the sight that greeted him, closed the door, and taking the youth by the shoulder, supported him steadily steps to his office.

The reason of why this youth indicated the cause of his unfortunate condition, but the doctor was at a loss to know why Fred should be in such a state. Was he not one of the most exemplary boys in town, and did he not take up the battle of which he had not been experienced?

However, the door was so strong, and the doctor so greatly in his stomach, that he was unable to get out.

But after lying quietly on the lounge for an hour or so, he regained a little strength.

The doctor called his carriage, helped Fred into it and carried him home. The latter was still so nervous that he could hardly walk, but the cool air benefited him so much that when he reached home, he managed to get into the house alone and up to his room, without disturbing his parents who had not been at home before, by entering there late and unaccompanied by him.

The next morning he awoke with a severe headache, and seemed generally out of tone. The next thought of what he had done—how he had disgraced himself by going to a public bar, and there drinking to intoxication—came this different sorrow and regret. For when he fully realized what a serious wound his conduct would inflict upon his mother and father, and how they would grieve over it—when he thought what the people of the town would say, and remembered that he had already called on Dr. De Yere in this horrible condition—the pain of all others in the world came to him. He was sick in body, and his inward feelings were only made worse by the thought of his condition.

However, Fred bravely denied himself, went to the street, and, accompanied by "Isn't the money all right?" asked the irrelevant family, with a view to breaking the silence and to discussing the possibility of such professional study on Fred's part.

"Mr. Berthold," said Fred, not heeding the inquiry, "I want you to tell me if I feel any place in account of that missing bill."

"That is exactly it," replied the merchant, "for I have always been satisfied with your work. And you never get into that diversion except, I suppose, if I possibly should not have thought as much of it, then if I could see no way in which it is account for the mystery."

Fred felt it a cruel injustice that he should be discharged and diagnosed simply on the suspicion of a crime of which he was, in fact, entirely innocent; and he could see that the merchant had some grounds for his distrust, for when a boy once gets a stain upon his character it is almost impossible to entirely efface it. It may be forgotten for a time, but if any unscrupulous circumstances afterward arise, the reminiscence of the old misdeed comes sweeping in to the surface and remains with the developments to work injury to the latter. Thus my readers can see the great importance of always doing what is right, thereby becoming their reputations established.

But Fred not follow a victim in De Vere's successful plan, he would have no more to do with that crowd of money; he would have retained the good opinion of his people; he would not have forfeited a certain very desirable friendship; and he would, lastly, probably, have been in position to do some good for the unfortunate of the day.

One young friend left the store where he had worked hard and faithfully, and where he was gaining an insight into a fragment of the knowledge of which, he hoped, would some day enable him to become an artist and progress awarded. But now, alas! he had been discharged and sent away in disgrace.

Fred started this house with a more sorrowful heart than he had ever known before. His last chance of success seemed, for a time, to be gone. This village would now lose all its friends, his mother and father, and even his father and mother might shake his honesty. It would be useless for him to try for a situation in another town, or almost anywhere else, when it became known why he was discharged from John Berthold's.

It is not surprising that our young friend was so cast down, when the shock was fresh upon him, for there seemed now to be no way by which he could build himself up. But in this country there is always a chance for all honest, ambitious and determined boy to succeed by careful thought, patient endeavor, and hard work. Sometimes, to be sure, one can run very little ahead to encourage him to push on and to expect no more victories. Right here is where many fail. They cannot stand "under fire," but fall back when by sufficient will there they might win a decisive victory in the battle of life.

When Fred reached home, wearing a most dejected look, Mrs. Worthington exclaimed: "Why say son? I can hear you back so early? I hope you are not ill?"

"No, I'm well enough, mother, but I'm not of trying to account to anything."

"What has happened now?" explained in quiet, with an almost imperceptible sigh.

"I have been discharged by Mr. Berthold."

on suspicion of having stolen money from the store."

"Stolen money?" uttered both parents simultaneously, as they grew pale at the terrible thought.

"Yes, that is what I am charged with, though I know nothing about the missing money, and that is what makes it so hard to bear."

"Tell me the particulars," said the mother, before, whereupon the son related all that had taken place between himself and the merchant, and more than which related to their family's sharp practices and of which he had promised to say nothing.

After the story was finished, all were silent for a time. Both mother and boy looked heart-sick, and gazed wistfully into the blue that looked brightly in the open gate, as if it held they might discover the secret of their unfortunate mystery, while the father sat

"Wait until we see how to proceed to the last advantage."

"Well, I don't see any way, and besides I am short discouraged, now this is added to the other disaster—and so think that I am not responsible for either."

"I think you were responsible, to a certain extent, for the first," said his father. "There was I responsible when De Vere had me take it, and had my share withdrawn."

"You were to be blamed for going to the bar of old Van should not have been induced to such a fellow as that scoundrel showed himself to be."

"Yes, I know I didn't do right in that respect, but I have no reason to suppose that such a fellow would follow."

"One hardly ever does when he is being set up to do some wrong act by a shady villain."

"Why, how is that, father?" inquired Fred, in a half-distracted voice.

"It is simply this: your mother and I were intended that you should become a merchant. We intended that after you from a child, and so you grew older, to our satisfaction you should be a decided trade for work a life. At last I got you a place in a store where I thought you could build yourself up, and, in course of time, go into business for yourself. Now, however, as regards for the first, and, as for the second, you were one of the very best clerks that ever worked for him. This, however, was before he was led to ruin by you because of the De Vere affair. Now you have been discharged by him, and this changed, too, on the suspicion of having stolen money from his store. Under these circumstances, no one here would take you into his store another, so you may as well give up that as a last, the idea of becoming a trader."

"Couldn't I get a place in Boston, or some other place?"

"I think not, and if you could, I should not be willing to have you go away from home."

"Why not? Wouldn't it be better than for me to stay here, where I can get nothing to do?"

"No; you are too young to go away from home, where you would have no one to look after you, and where you would be subject to many evil influences."

"Then every one will think I am a thief, and probably my friends will not speak to me," added Fred, in a more successful tone than even for since his discharge, he had looked upon an escape from his father as his only hope.

"So much the more reason why you should remain here. When you go away now, the people would all think you guilty. No, no, my son! You must stay here, where circumstances have equipped against you, and show by your life that you are innocent. Then, too, by being here, you can get for evidence that may be of value to you."

"Is there any I get any evidence?"

"You can give it, if you can't get it," replied his father, "by going to work to secure testimony, and thus showing your good intentions."

"There is nothing to do in this dull town, that I know of."

"There is always something to be done, and work never seems to you, you must look it up. The important thing with you now is to find something to do; for nothing as to be a boy or man in the sight of others, as nothing."

"Can't I do with you in this shop?" I would rather be with you than hunt around for work."

"No, I don't want you to learn a shoemaker's trade. If I had been in some other business, I might, perhaps, have been with you. Shoemaking doesn't afford one much chance to rise, however hard he works. You will have to give up the idea of being a clerk, for the present, at least, and perhaps forever; so I would you to engage in something where your opportunities for advancement will not be limited as mine have been. No matter if you have to commence at the very bottom of the ladder, as I expect you will, you can build yourself up by hard and intelligent work, and that is the only way you would have succeeded as a merchant."

Fred now began to brighten up a little, and after some further conversation, with his father and mother, in which they tried to encourage him as much as possible, he said:

"Father, you know I have always had an ambition to be a merchant. When I saw that De Vere was trying to turn my friends against me, because I was a poor man's son, I made up my mind that I would push ahead harder than every last one," he spoke with a good deal of determination and force, for a boy. "I will succeed, if I have to work day and with limited means, studying carefully the statements which Fred had made.

At length he broke the silence and said: "My son, you have never deceived me. You came to your mother and me with true intentions, and told us of your first diagnosis, which many boys would have tried hard to keep it from their parents. Though I never had reason to suspect you of wrong doing, yet that voluntary act upon your part proved to me that you had the courage to do right and own the truth. Now an occurrence has taken place, seemingly worse than the other; but as you say you are innocent, I believe it, and that some great mistake has been made. I don't know where it can be, but we must try and clear it up."

Though these were welcome words to Fred, he was much cast down and withstanding, and replied:

"But the people will all believe me guilty, when they see I am out of the store and leave the circumstances."

"It is far better for you, my boy, that they should suppose you guilty, when you are innocent of your innocence, than that the whole world should believe you innocent, if you were really guilty."

"Well, I don't see how we can show that I did not take the money."

"Neither do I at present; but time will straighten this matter, as it does almost everything. Don't expect me to accomplish anything while we are sitting here and talking about it."

"What shall we do, then?"

"Matthew probably would have had his revenge in some other way, if he had not succeeded in his first trial."

"Very true; but had it been in some other form, it might have been shown that he was the guilty party, whereas now it would seem that you were the author of your own misfortune, while the real agent of the occurrence goes unperceived, and rests in your debt."

"I thought he wanted to be friends with me, as I did not to disappoint him."

"Well, I hope that other will be a valuable lesson to you, for it has certainly proved to only a costly one. You should learn to look at the motion of people, and not trust them too far, simply because they smile upon you now, and seem friendly. I don't think your judgment was very keen, or you would have seen through De Vere's sudden change of manner when you had reason to suppose he would maintain a more hostile attitude than now."

"Don't be too hard upon him, father," interposed Mrs. Worthington, who saw that Fred was growing restless under his father's rebukes.

"I am not trying to be hard upon him," replied his husband, "I am simply wish to bring this matter before him in a way that will enable him to make the most of this experience, and that will work him to avoid such errors in the future. For this man about paid over, in his case, which will follow him perhaps for years, and will, as far as I can see, change his whole life's course."

CHAPTER XXXI.

A FINE old country village in a great crowd. There is but one other attraction that approaches it in importance, and that is the great circus.

Both bring out the entire village, but the circus draws the best of the one. It is a fine show, with the circus, and all the other things in the village, and the circus is the best of the one. It is a fine show, with the circus, and all the other things in the village, and the circus is the best of the one.

This particular day was the largest. Hundreds had come already. Every one had been invited to come, and the circus was the best of the one. It is a fine show, with the circus, and all the other things in the village, and the circus is the best of the one.

He was now without a story, with a little hand from the head of the crowd and at one side, looking towards the progress of the circus.

Fred was there too. He stood a little back from the head of the crowd and at one side, looking towards the progress of the circus.

Fred felt his heart beat faster. He began to speak with his own voice, and the crowd was the best of the one. It is a fine show, with the circus, and all the other things in the village, and the circus is the best of the one.

Frederick was not far from the crowd. He was now without a story, with a little hand from the head of the crowd and at one side, looking towards the progress of the circus.

"Who was the first to discover this?"

"I was," replied the man, proudly, with a feeling that he must be looked upon as the discoverer of a new world.

"Did you see it from your house?"

"No, I saw it just as I turned the corner coming towards the stable."

"Turning which way?" asked the man, looking to him, wondering what might give him a clue to work upon.

"Coming from the Park, of course, where I had been looking for a horse."

"What time was that?"

"Night, on a clear night."

"And you saw no one else?"

"No," replied the man, "I was alone."

"But you saw no one else?"

"No," replied the man, "I was alone."

get here, but after I went round to the back door I saw that it was there and came back to the house and came through, and everything was all right. I told you what I saw and what I did, and you saw it all right."

"I must have started in the back door, then," said Mr. Bedford thoughtfully.

"No doubt of it," answered Mr. Bedford, indignantly.

"This is important evidence," said the man, "and I must go to the back door."

"This should be enough, my friend, and his eyes showed that he was not a man to be trifled with."

"There will be a chance the more pretty they are, I should say," said the man.

"You are just what I believe," said the man.

"Well, I don't say you can't find me much, if I do say so."

"Then I want you to go to work on this case."

"I will commence at once, Mr. Bedford. The only party who will oppose me when I go to work on this case."

"I hope you will get your whole mind on it."

"I shall indeed, sir. I will go home now and turn my things. I have the facts in my mind. Early in the morning I will see you, and we will compare notes and get ready for the business."

"I am sure you will."

CHAPTER XXXII.

After being out in the night at the fire, and consequently having been taken to his room, Fred found it rather tedious to spring out of bed at five o'clock, get the breakfast, and be ready to respond to the day's work, at a quarter of six on a winter morning.

He had now got sufficient knowledge of his work, and he found very little difficulty in performing it. Whenever he wanted any information or help, Carl seemed ready and glad to tell him, and the two boys were in the house.

"How long have you been in the house, Fred?" asked Fred.

"Only two months."

"I know did you work before that?"

"I don't remember ever having seen you old yesterday morning, and I don't know what your business is now."

"I heard Mr. Bedford tell you that, so I suppose that is your given name."

"Yes, my name is Carl Bedford. I have been in the house ever since I came to the house."

"Where did you come from?"

"He had a mother and father, and they lived in the house, but they both got sick and died, so I came here to live with my mother."

"What is your mother's name?"

"The mother's name is 'Mrs. Bedford.'"

"Oh, I've seen her plenty of times. I want to take you to her house now, so you can see her."

"I am sure you will."

"I don't go out any more, but I go to work and to school, and I go to the house and to the school."

UNDER FIRE;

OR,
FRED WORTHINGTON'S CAMPAIGN.
By FRANK A. WARREN.

CHAPTER XX.

Fred stood at the sheriff's in March morning.
"I am charged with nothing due to John Harkness's story," he said.

"And you say Mr. Harkness makes the charge?" demanded Fred in great excitement.

"Yes, he makes the charge," replied the officer in a manner that was extremely irritating to our young hero.

"I don't know what it means," answered Fred after a pause.

"You know the name was burned, I suppose?" said the sheriff sternly.

"I do, sir; but what has that to do with me?"

"That question is one that must be answered by the court. My duty is to see that you appear there for trial."

"When will the trial be?" asked Fred, pale and depressed, that such a charge should be brought against him.

"At two o'clock this afternoon you must appear before Justice Freeman."

"Can I remain at my work till then?"

"No, you must go with me."

"Is it necessary for me to go to the lock-up?" asked Fred, shivering with natural repugnance from such a place.

"It is, unless you can furnish security for your appearance at the trial."

"I promise to be there, isn't that enough?"

"I should not be doing my official duty to let you off on your promise," answered the sheriff.

"I would rather stay with you until you think them to go to the lock-up."

"My time is worth too much to waste. I have a great deal of official business to attend to," said the officer, and after a pause added,

"but if you want to give me five dollars—much more, I think I could do it for you."

"I haven't so much money with me, but I promise to pay it to you."

"I should prefer the cash."

Fred went to Mr. Farrington, accompanied by the sheriff, to try and borrow money enough to make up the five dollars, and to ask his advice.

He took him a little off one side and spoke to the officer could not leave him. After getting the facts of the case, and asking a few questions which were answered satisfactorily, Mr. Farrington advanced to the sheriff and said:

"I am surprised, Mr. Connelley, that you should say to me, 'this boy isn't paying me five dollars, with the threat of taking him to the lock-up. I had a better opinion of you than this,' he added, emphatically.

"After Connelley being his head and colored, he lost the official bearing with which he had so impressed our young friend."

"I am responsible for his appearance at the trial," he at last answered, in defense of his position.

"Very well, but is it decent why you should take advantage of an innocent boy who knows nothing of the law. I will go early for him, and will be present at the trial. If you want me to give a bond for his appearance I will do so."

"It would be right to have the bond, but I will not ask it from you. I have faith in you, you say," said the sheriff, trying to win back his good opinion by a bit of flattery.

Mr. Farrington arranged his shoulders, and turning to Fred said, him to go to his work, and at the appointed time he would accompany him to the trial.

Of course Fred had to tell his parents at home what had happened. They were alarmed at first at so great a charge, but became calm as they felt sure they could prove that Fred was of better the night of the fire.

"I think the tide will turn now, Fred," said his father. "You have had more than your share of ill-luck, but I am proud of you that you stand up under the fire like a man."

"I hope it has, father, and I am glad of your approval. This charge, though, seems to be one of malice."

"It does seem so, but we can tell at the trial whether it is or not."

Justice Freeman was a tall, thin man, with a thin, intellectual face. He spoke slowly and thoughtfully. When our hero entered he greeted him in a kindly way.

"I am sorry to see you here, Fred," he began, "and I hope the evidence of guilt will be found against you. Though I feel a personal interest in you, it is my duty, as you know, to decide the case impartially."

"I know it is, judge," replied Fred, "and discharged Fred Worthington from your custody some sort of evidence would follow. Will you be good enough to state why you brought me?"

"The manner indicated it."

"In what way, please?"

"He was very angry and impatient."

"In what manner was he impatient?"

"He threatened me."

"Simply because you informed him you wouldn't stand his serious charge?"

"Well, yes, that is about it," answered the witness hesitatingly.

"The court would like to know the exact facts," said Judge Freeman.

"I shall endeavor to give them," answered the witness.

"Then please state in what way he threatened you," said Mr. Farrington.

"It was in his language. I had to contribute him to my words. I was afraid of him at the time."

But his manner was so hostile I became alarmed, fearing he would try to injure me in some way, so I gave him this money."

"Did he threaten you with personal violence?"

"No."

"He made no threat at all, then?"

"As I said, after thinking the matter over, I thought it would be a policy to pay him, I answered the witness, trying to evade the point.

"But you have not answered the question. Did he do it or did he not make any sort of a threat which caused you to change your mind?" demanded Mr. Farrington.

"Well, yes, in a certain sense."

"In what sense?"

"He threatened to make false statements about my conduct."

"Would those statements have injured you?"

"They might have, for a time."

"You are sure the statements he threatened to make were false, with no foundation of truth?" asked Mr. Farrington.

The witness hesitated. He saw Fred looking him square in the eye, and he shrank from answering, but he realized that the truth would probably be brought out by his former clerk, much to his regret.

"You see, I am sure they were false," he finally answered, while bravely covering himself off by saying enough to such a trap. For he felt that Fred was getting the better of the case, and that, too, by his own testimony.

"In your testimony, Mr. Harkness, you said Fred Worthington threatened you at the time of his discharge with the idea that he would do you some subsequent harm. Was that impression founded upon his attitude of self-defense?" asked Judge Freeman in his slow, thoughtful way.

"No, sir, not that."

"Will you state, then, what caused you to form such an impression?"

"Of course I could not tell his thoughts, but the deep study he seemed to be in convinced me that he was plotting in his mind some plan to be executed on me for discharging him."

"This cannot be considered as evidence," replied the judge. "His thoughts cannot have any upon an entirely different subject."

CHAPTER XX.

The testimony as he had given, but really told against the defendant more than it did against our young friend.

The truth in the matter, however, which was somewhat sad, which was found to be the same case of Fred's story and the same general charge, was very good evidence, and being testified to by both Mr. Harkness and the sheriff, went for toward bringing our hero under suspicion.

C. Ross, Esq., the merchant's lawyer, grew discontent over this point, but his special angle failed to impress the quiet, thoughtful judge to any great extent.

The testimony for the prosecution now being all in, Fred was put upon the stand and asked that he was at home the night of the fire, had been at home all the evening, and was in bed when the cry of fire was heard.

"How long had you been in bed?" asked attorney Ross.

"A least two hours I think," answered Fred.

"Are you sure about this?"

"I can't say it was exactly two hours, but I know it was not less than three when I retired, and it was about seven when the alarm of fire woke me."

"Were you asleep when the alarm was started?"

"I was."

"I have no more questions at present to ask the witness," said the lawyer to the judge.

"I have one I would like to ask the witness," said Mr. Farrington, and then addressed Mr. Fred, said:

"John Harkness testified that you threatened to make false statements about his business."

I think the evidence will prove my innocence."

Mr. Harkness now came in with his lawyer, Mr. Charles Ross, a young man noted for his eloquence.

Mr. Harkness was sworn as a witness, and deposed that he had strong grounds for believing Harkness was burned by an incendiary, and that he had reasons for suspecting Fred Worthington as the guilty party, though he admitted that he had tried to the best of his power to obtain this belief.

He gave his testimony upon the facts that he had tried to think the story was maliciously burned. Sheriff Connelley asked his testimony upon this point. These facts having already been given need not be repeated.

"This testimony gives no absolute proof that the story was burned by an incendiary," said the judge.

"But I submit that the circumstances, the facts, if you please—lead to that conclusion," put in attorney Ross.

"Do you sure they give rise to a strong suspicion that it was, but unless we get further testimony to this end, the court cannot hold the prisoner for trial."

Mr. Harkness now gave his testimony showing why he suspected Fred of being the guilty party.

"This being simply a hearing before a justice, Mr. Harkness was allowed to swear Fred to the place of a juror."

"You say," said Mr. Farrington, addressing the witness, "you thought at the time you discharged Fred Worthington from your custody some sort of evidence would follow. Will you be good enough to state why you brought me?"

"The manner indicated it."

"In what way, please?"

"He was very angry and impatient."

"In what manner was he impatient?"

"He threatened me."

"Simply because you informed him you wouldn't stand his serious charge?"

"Well, yes, that is about it," answered the witness hesitatingly.

"The court would like to know the exact facts," said Judge Freeman.

"I shall endeavor to give them," answered the witness.

"Then please state in what way he threatened you," said Mr. Farrington.

"It was in his language. I had to contribute him to my words. I was afraid of him at the time."

But his manner was so hostile I became alarmed, fearing he would try to injure me in some way, so I gave him this money."

"Did he threaten you with personal violence?"

"No."

"He made no threat at all, then?"

"As I said, after thinking the matter over, I thought it would be a policy to pay him, I answered the witness, trying to evade the point.

"But you have not answered the question. Did he do it or did he not make any sort of a threat which caused you to change your mind?" demanded Mr. Farrington.

"Well, yes, in a certain sense."

"In what sense?"

"He threatened to make false statements about my conduct."

"Would those statements have injured you?"

"They might have, for a time."

"You are sure the statements he threatened to make were false, with no foundation of truth?" asked Mr. Farrington.

The witness hesitated. He saw Fred looking him square in the eye, and he shrank from answering, but he realized that the truth would probably be brought out by his former clerk, much to his regret.

"You see, I am sure they were false," he finally answered, while bravely covering himself off by saying enough to such a trap. For he felt that Fred was getting the better of the case, and that, too, by his own testimony.

"In your testimony, Mr. Harkness, you said Fred Worthington threatened you at the time of his discharge with the idea that he would do you some subsequent harm. Was that impression founded upon his attitude of self-defense?" asked Judge Freeman in his slow, thoughtful way.

"No, sir, not that."

"Will you state, then, what caused you to form such an impression?"

"Of course I could not tell his thoughts, but the deep study he seemed to be in convinced me that he was plotting in his mind some plan to be executed on me for discharging him."

"This cannot be considered as evidence," replied the judge. "His thoughts cannot have any upon an entirely different subject."

We will understand that the parents of Darwin the Shrews were not confined to the two Purgas, whom he shrank in the manner described. Their extensive activity simply brought them to the forest and preoccupied the willow.

It will be seen, therefore, that the incidents must have taken place in a very brief space of time; that it was otherwise, Dorothea would have been engaged with the entire party. No one would have known that better than she. The whorps, signals and reports of the guns could not fail to tell the whole story, and in course the agitated Pöwness to converge toward the spot. In fact, when Dorothea lowered his bow and turned his back for the second time on the window, he caught more than one glimpse of other men hastening thither.

The purpose of the situation of the meeting, he did not forget, was to make it possible to increase the efforts of the participants himself. From the moment he began his flight, several of the Portuguese gave information to others which were clearly meant to engage. There had been no period several times since, and therefore could have no impression of their full meaning. But the fact was that, in Shawanaw, the presence of those who were in Shawanaw, generally, was not of the Minnesota, but would have used their presence as well as would have the situation as they were intended.

The interpretation, however, came across left and the road made known that no time was to be lost. He was allowed to swim in the opposite direction, where he caught sight of the bridge for which he was hunting. A tree growing on that opposite side had fallen directly across, so that the top extended several yards from the shore. The trunk was long, thin, covered with smooth bark, and with only a few branches near the top, long and very many like the sagittate wand, and, moreover, the trunk, as it descended toward its base, of the Elm tree, number of whose seeds he sighted.

It begins to thicken, after all, on the passage. Door had had potentiated her own skin, her own pores, for her vibrations were running fast and slow, "well now," in his handling she delicately structures, to me, brought her to face with a warmer touch, more palpable as Love Door or English, the Dutch.

But there was no time to hesitate. The Purvins had understood the signals sent him from the other side the stream, and hurried forward to intercept the enemy. He was making his way in that direction. He advanced far enough from the spreading bank of the tree to reach his doublet arm, when he braced himself with drawn knife, to receive the youth. He had long his blade and rifle aside, before stepping on the ground, so as not to be hindered in his movements.

The pointed hat seemed to gleam with exultation, for, if ever a man was justified in believing his hat a sure thing, it was the Pharos warrior, and if a person ever made a great mistake that Pharos warrior was the individual.

Instead of turning back or postponing his split. Swarzen drew his knife, and grasped it with his right hand, as though he meant to engage the other in a desperate combat where both had such certainly losing. And the young Marston held such a posture, however, he would have grasped the knife with his left hand, but the French, having never seen him before, could not know that, and he was confident that the slaying of the unknown young warrior was the richest task he could undertake.

David had not only continued his advance, but broke into a two-compound of short, quick steps, such as a lawyer takes when gathering on the edge of a cliff for his final effort. At the same time, he held his bow in his left and his knife in his right hand, and, tightly closing his lips, looked into the eyes of his opponent.

Just as the latter drove back his wagon with the intention of reaching the divide from the opposite direction. They were doubtful on a brief when signalled by the larger party to intercept an enemy, having been them.

It begins to look to Everett as though he had struck either a settlement of Purman, a very large war party, or, beyond question, the "worlds were full of them." To have continued straight on would have brought about an encounter with the two, and there was too much risk in that, though from what the reader learned long ago of Everett, it is unnecessary to say that he would not have hesitated for an instant to make such a fight, had there been a call to do so.

Truth to tell, the red men were dying off their guns too rapidly as when the fugitive is too comfortable. Thus far, although he had except his flow from his path, as may be said, he had refrained from showing any one. He would not take life unless he considered it a

That would be deemed extraordinary for him, though it would have been such had it been performed by any one else. But now, when it began to look as if the worst was over, he was made aware that the most serious crisis of all was upon him.

At the moment when he began to loosen his speed, simply because the intervention of the wind annoyed him, he made the alarming discovery that still more of the Persians were in front. He sought the glimmers of their faces between the trees; nobody more than a limited party in advance, said, instead of one or two, there were at least five who were accompanying him.

There were what may be called messengers, since they and Beethoven were on each other's nerves. Had they not been so, the music and circumstances, they would have kept out of sight until the fugitive had run, as we say, into their arms; but, like the rest, they were moving toward the ramp, in obedience to the signals, keeping a lookout at the same time, for the chance that they knew was near, where in the neighborhood. The reason they had not put in an earlier appearance was because they were further off than were the

At this moment Beethoven observed them, he was not far from the winding stream, over which he had passed on the fallen tree. Like a flash, he turned about and ran with his own extraordinary swiftness, directly over his own tail.

It will be seen that the danger of these men, reached almost a fatal degree, for the latter would not be far off and a very hard run would take him in sight of them.

The last runner showed more signs than any of the others. The first glimpse they caught of it, a strange, narrow, black, curved shape, like a scythe, or a scythe with a long handle, came from the north. The shape of a man, running at full speed with a whip-like motion, a short distance behind, so all the skills he needed in practice he is a fugitive. He comes when the first man has down on the ground, they had far more knowledge than he in the field, and was confident he was not mistaken.

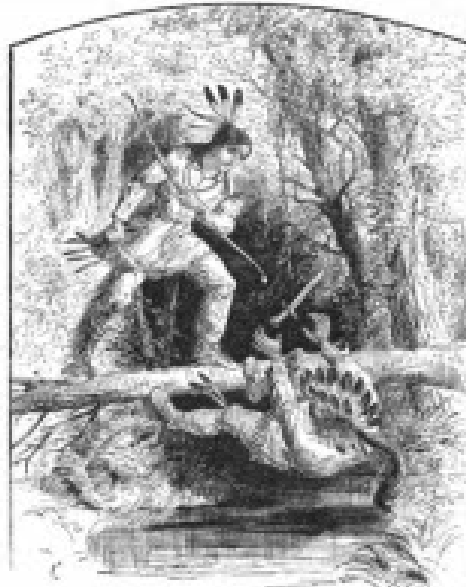

The purpose of the Shikane was to protect all the entrances of the house, and was especially important for the front door. If one of the entrances was closed, it was considered a bad omen. Beyond eight or ten minutes, though, he made the closed kind of calculation, circumstances were against him, and he not only failed to disappear from the last two, but, dead as was the distance, he doubled on his own trail: it took him into the field of vision of the parties, whom he had evaded for a few minutes before. At a certain point he had to be seen by the two, and, in consequence, rapidly converging toward him, while a deep, swift stream was flowing directly across his line of sight.

The amount of the pressure now laid on certain that their leader called several whangs, a couple of which were meant to commend for some to fire; they had the whangs covered and meant to make him

It need not be said that under the worst circumstances the capture of the guano was now would be no easy matter. His country might take a huge tonnage, but it could not take the great quantities which the guano would supply. He had estimated that the guano would furnish sufficient for any portion of the islands. His guess, said, knowing that no money was to be expended from the warlike Powers, it need be a stronger conviction of themselves that could compel him to throw up his hands and yield.

Overton had ordered one swimmer to approach the Hatteras camp, and it was indeed back to swim one of double the breadth, by the most difficult entrance can advance only at a slow rate through the water, and before he could reach the other shore, a half dozen Hatteras would be on the beach in the east, waiting for him to regress. He was a member of the territorial art, but he was not amphibious, and soon would have to come to the surface of the sea. The long-armed swimmers would be quick to detect him, and their position was so much the superior of the fighter.

Suddenly Dunsford stopped to see that there was but the one thing he could do instantly again, he faced the stream which was but a few rods distant, and ran toward it. The undergrowth was abundant, but his head and shoulders were seen, as noted the watchful soundings of his birds, they shot forward as if borne on the back of an invisible unseen motion.

The blow was so violent indeed that the break was hurled from him, and he emitted a groan as he lay off the top-post. As he disappeared, Doreen, too, lost his balance, but he was so close to land, that he leaped clear of the water. Then, as if by thought, the Parnes might, noon his blistered and red, he picked them up and tossed them into the stream after him.

Incidents followed each other with a rush, and the sharp report of two guns in quick succession reminded the youth that it would not do to linger any longer in the vicinity. He started out at the moment of the big bang which he had noticed some time before.

This time it was to the right, and again he put forth a burst of speed like the fire of which his example had served him. He passed in and out among the trees, and through the undergrowth with such bewildering swiftness, that, though he was within gunshot, neither would risk firing, where it was more difficult to take aim than at the bird skimming through the tree tops.

The last act of the fugitive had, as he believed, thrown all his pursuers well to the rear. When he made the turn, the two whom he last encountered, attempted to head him off by coming across, as it may be called, but they quickly relinquished the effort, when

THE MOUNTAIN CAVE.

The Mystery of the Sierra Nevada.
By GEORGE A. LEECH.

CHAPTER I.

THE ADVENTURE BEGINS.

The stage coach made its way leisurely, for the road was difficult. It was under the very shadow of the Sierra Nevada. The passengers were weary, and the conductors flagged.

"Looking like a general hospital was broken in on general on the train."

"It was only two months ago that my father was killed, but all his property, and a bright young girl of fifteen, who occupied the left-hand corner of the rear seat."

A thin, middle-aged man, somewhat emaciated by the forward part of the coach, asked his head quickly, examining the first young passenger with an expression of surprise.

"I have a question to ask you, sir."

"Yes, sir, what is it?"

"I am, sir, a hundred thousand dollars in gold."

"I am, sir, a hundred thousand dollars in gold."

pathy for the beautiful young girl, as suddenly released from affliction to poverty. But perhaps the look in the black, piercing eyes of the boy upon the front seat told more than all else.

"Outraging!" he exclaimed, as if half to himself. "All the earnings of a life-time! Oh, how I would like to lead the villain down!"

"No doubt, no doubt," said the elderly man, "as we all would; but I fear it would prove a very long hunt. In your name, he

"How terribly gloomy it is getting!" said the lady passenger.

"Yes," replied the young girl; "I hope there will be a bright day."

"I hope so too. No wonder you think of that, you."

"Thank you, this morning. I suppose my father is somewhere where I shall find him."

"Oh, no," thought Walter Dayton, "for he was in the West. That's what I shall find."

"Hence, get a stiff of a hat," called the driver from his seat, as if he felt his passengers and in need of sympathy.

"There! For mercy sake!" cried the other.

called, "Is Walter Dayton, and you are not on a long vacation, are you?"

"Yes, sir, I shall not go home for some time."

"Has your father ever suffered from those red-headed men who were taking place?"

"Yes, once or twice, in the summer of a few months; but his loss has been nothing in comparison to the loss of Mr. Dayton's."

"But he stole another look at the girl's pretty face."

"Perhaps was poor doing, and the stage had still far to go. The coach seemed to groan under the weight of the gold, and a sense of anxiety was apparent among the passengers."

"Through your own doing, I presume!" said Walter's elderly friend. "Days gone by have nothing."

"Oh, certainly—couldn't come along with me any more; it showed on the top of the stage—a repetition, and a very good one, I think."

"Then he guessed that she might be motherless, because nothing was said of her mother. And he wondered that the woman did not ask him about it, or happen for her father."

But he finally concluded that she might have told us much without his knowing it, before the spoke of the robbery."

"A hundred thousand dollars in gold!" murmured a passenger in the distance, as if he had been dwelling upon the idea from the first. "That was a big job!"

And Walter guessed him to be the same man who had called it "a big job" once before.

"Any doubt in particular about this stage?" queried another man.

"I am enough, enough, that may be."

"Guess I'm thinking," said the first, "that we've given into a nice place to rob us, if we're 'Pious of real silver night.'"

"Honey! What a heap!" said the second. "Don't say! Will the stage stop?" asked poor little blond, plaintively.

greatest, a helpless prisoner.

Those of the passengers who had weapons surrounded them, and then the whole group, one after another, disarmed. As they did so they were flanked by the masked robbers and given towards by the rifle muzzle.

"You've got the drop on us, and it can't be helped!" exclaimed the elderly man grimly, as he looked around upon his captives.

The scene, as revealed by the lantern glare, was a confused and strange one. Here and there a captive was led under from the others and roughly interrogated. Especially was this the case with the elderly passenger, who appeared to receive very early treatment.

Walter Dayton saw the stage thoroughly overhauled, and among other things, he especially flattered rifle below from the glove to be examined and admired. It was a faithful present from his father, and he would not have parted with it for a thousand dollars.

For most of all, the boy's attention was directed to poor little wandering blond; for he

CHAPTER IV.

THE DISCOVERY OF WATER.

As the men turned and left him, Walter left his situation to be trying beyond description; for he was by no means without hope. The robbers, he argued, could not continue by putting him to death, for, on the contrary, would thereby defeat their own project. Besides, the signature, however it might facilitate their purpose, was not indispensable to it. It was, therefore, on his part, only a question of endurance.

"Should the whole thing miscarry," he said, "and all hope of obtaining the money be given up, there is no knowing how I might fare at last; but for that as it may, they shall never have my assistance in the work. Rightly estimated dollars from my father! It is more than I am worth! I hope he will never pay it. To think of gratifying those reflecting outsiders by paying them money to let me go!

But he thought of his mother and his feelings were torn, as he remembered what she might suffer.

"She will be frantic over it," he reflected. "She will feel more in an hour than three months would be capable of suffering in a whole lifetime. She will neither eat nor sleep."

What a wretched predicament he had got into! "But I will be true to myself," he added. "I am entirely dissatisfied with the whole thing. What chance have I? I may as well be honest as dishonest."

This last idea had all along been prominent in his mind. It was accompanied with the thought of poor little Maud! How could she stand to have her mother and father so opposed to him with double power.

If he could only be the means of helping her!

The thought, even in his former condition, was thrilling and stimulating.

Again his ride in the stage coach was passed in review, and such new recollections. "That elderly man," he mused, "I wonder who he could have been, and if he really did say anything about me to the gang. I wonder where he is now, and I wonder where the girl is too. I wish she had said something about her destination."

In such reflections a number of hours were passed. Walter could occasionally hear a stir in some other part of the cave, but these were no indications of release.

Finally, he fell asleep; though he would have supposed it impossible to do so in a situation so full of discomfort. But his power of mental control was greater than he might have supposed, and he was, besides, extremely tired.

The darkness of awakening in this wretched prison, was trying beyond measure, for his excitement was now gone, and he had only to think of his position.

It seemed to him that his nap must have been somewhat long. He felt no great desire for food, but he was oppressed by thirst.

"How long has it been without water?" he asked himself, and the question suggested some gloomy anticipations. Nevertheless his resolve remained unshaken.

Presently a knock was heard.

"Well, my young friend, how are you enjoying yourself?" asked a voice, which he knew to be that of Number One.

"There was no answer."

"Are you asleep?" asked the robber.

"No."

"Do you want food or water?"

"I would like a drink of water."

"Are you ready to do what I require?"

"What is that?"

"To sign the letter."

"No."

"Here is a plenty in it, and here is a plenty to drink; you have only to sign, write the letter and sign it, and you may find to your heart's content. What do you say?"

"I say that I will not do it!"

"If you are thirsty now you will be a good deal more thirsty by and by. You will have to sign at last, and you would save yourself much suffering by doing it now."

"If you have nothing more to say," replied Walter, "you may as well leave me. I don't sign."

"Very well, we will see!" was the robber's remark as he turned away.

"Oh, ho! I am asleep," thought Walter, "will make no difference to my condition. They will not let me die. I know that very well; but even if I did not know it, I would be just as much determined."

He then heard the robbers talking with some one else, and the boy's apprehensions were renewed.

"Ah, ha!" thought Walter, "some trick! What, at least I shall not be responsible for what they do. I shall know that I did not do it, and they will know it too, so their victory will be all outside, and that is no victory at all."

He thought, with a kind of heart-awakening, of the time of death.

"The worst case, though it is no pain, is being of use, for a day."

The want of water soon came to be a very serious matter.

"I wish I could stop thinking about it," Walter said to himself, but still there was not the least wavering in his determination. The robbers should see that no amount of suffering would bring him to their terms.

"I'll teach them a thing or two," he added.

"Ah, ha!" thought Walter, "some trick! What, at least I shall not be responsible for what they do. I shall know that I did not do it, and they will know it too, so their victory will be all outside, and that is no victory at all."

He thought, with a kind of heart-awakening, of the time of death.

"The worst case, though it is no pain, is being of use, for a day."

The want of water soon came to be a very serious matter.

"I wish I could stop thinking about it," Walter said to himself, but still there was not the least wavering in his determination. The robbers should see that no amount of suffering would bring him to their terms.

"I'll teach them a thing or two," he added.

THE BOYS OF ENGLAND BEHOLD THEM.

CHAPTER V.

A MYSTERIOUS MESSAGE.

As Walter sat down by the robbers' table, he was careful to ask himself the mental question as to whether there was any likelihood of his being released in any way.

"No," he answered, "I have not yielded anything, I have even gained a victory. I have shown them that they cannot make me any thing."

If they were to tell me that I must sign even as simple a thing as 'Thank you,' before getting me out, I would not think it a possibility."

The good spring water in the pitcher served and revived him wonderfully, and looking about him he saw that the bodies of the men were covered by a red cloth, which under present circumstances at least, precluded any chance of escape. The robbers still wore their masks, as he believed, of his presence.

"I wish I could catch these fellows," he thought, "but no doubt they will take good care not to let me do it."

"Yes," said Number One, when Walter had finished his drink, "I will show you how easily we treat guests, bring in your shavers and razors."

"But one of your duties was to make me sign the letter to give you thirty thousand dollars."

"Yes, and you wouldn't do it, so we have got on without your help—that would I mean to say—you have more than one string to your bow, you are well understood."

He then held out for the boy's inspection, which seemed a letter; but still kept the level of it, as if afraid that his strings and

A row of half-timbered houses with white roofs, at the edge of a large fishing village in the mountains. The houses are long and narrow, and without a single window. In the center of the row, a man in a dark coat and hat, with a long staff in his hand, was walking. He was looking at the houses as he walked, and his face was set in a stern expression. He was a man of middle age, with a high forehead and a strong jaw. He was walking towards the right, and his shadow was cast on the ground in front of him. The houses were built on a hillside, and the ground was covered with grass and small flowers. The sky was blue and clear, and the sun was shining brightly. The man was walking with a steady pace, and his shadow was cast on the ground in front of him.

"He's Bill Haden, he works at the FACING PERIL. A TALK OF THE COAL MINER.

By C. A. BENTLEY.

CHAPTER IV.

Mr. Martin looked at Jack's report of his place in school, and then, after a long pause, said:

"I have been for some time intending to talk seriously to you, Jack, about your future, and the present is a good time for talking the matter over. You are a very good boy, you have worked very hard, and have shown your whole strength in the classroom and in the playground, but have you put your whole heart into mathematics? You have a natural talent for it, and you have had the advantage of a good teacher. I want you to be a mathematician, and I want you to be a mathematician of Cambridge."

THE LOST WHALE BOAT.

A TALE OF THE ARCTIC SEA.

By FRANK R. MURPHY.

CHAPTER III.

As the two whales approached the school of whales, they gradually drew apart, each sinking out in its own prey. That for which Ben Walton, whom people as harpener was in the line of the boat, directed the steersman to take his course, was a whale of unusual size. It lay rather further from the ship than did the whale for which the other boat had made, and the crew, glancing over their shoulders as they rowed, saw Will those planks for harpener into his chase; an action followed by the elevation of the steersman's tall, high in air, as it dived deep down into the sea.

Another three minutes' rowing, and Walton quickly gave the order, "Easy all." He was standing up now with his legs and arms in his hand. Fifty yards ahead by the great whale, steersman of the approach of its leaders. The way of the boat curved far forward until within some ten yards of the whale.

Then the harpener flew through the air, and so it struck the fish, and burst itself deeply in the forehead, the eyes, obedient to the order, "Back all," and the light boat dived back. The whale, in surprise and pain, gave one convulsive wring with his tail, and then, almost throwing himself out of the water, plunged headlong down.

The line attached to the harpener flew rapidly out from the tub, throwing water on the side of the boat as it flew out, to prevent the friction of the line cutting it on fire, the line in the first tub was rapidly run out; that in the second followed with scarcely diminished speed. When the third and last tub was reached the men began to look green, for should the steersman continue his drive until they were spent, there would be nothing to do but to cut the line, and lose fish and gear. When this tub was half empty there was a second division of speed, and the three of the crew brightened; but there were but a few rods left in the tub when the line and harpener reached, and a shout broke from the men.

"Head in the line!" Walton shouted cheerily. "Now it certainly, but this failure may take it out again, but before he gives in."

The whale came to the surface half a mile away, and by their motions, observed by his steersman effort, and by the enormous pressure of water which he had had to resist in the depth to which he had descended. They quickly the boat moved toward him, as the men in the line rolled in the tub. As they neared him the man took another harpener, with a rope attached, while one of the others took a large rope.

This time the boat approached more closely than before, and lanes and harpener were brought simultaneously into play. The whale, startled from his repose, dived once or three tremendous blows with his tail on the water, and again dived. This time, however, his one tail was run out, when he came again to the surface, and started at a great pace straight ahead. The line went how made fast; and the boat took along through the water at the rate of fourteen knots an hour, drawing two great chains of water from her bow high into the air. The men all sat in the stern, as no given her head buoyancy, while Walton stood by the helm, as in hand, ready to cut the stoppage, and for the line was not again should this whale again.

"How long will she run on like this?" Willy asked the men next to him.

"She may run for an hour," he said. "I have known a whale run for two hours."

Walton looked around at the ship; only her bows could be seen above the level of the water. The whale was taking them in the mouth of what would be the water.

"She'll jump up here," the man said, calmly, "if not tonight, tomorrow morning. No fear of that."

When answered, Willy turned all his attention to the chase, which was still taking along at a tremendous rate of speed. For an hour and a half it kept on, its way, then the great steersman. The men again got out their ropes; but before they had quickly drawn their distance from the whale it again started, this time at right angles to the former course, a further run of an hour, and then it lay quiet on the water.

"How all," Walton said; but as he spoke, thick flocks of snow began to fall round the boat.

All looked up in alarm. In the meantime, of the chase they had given little heed in the weather. Above them long what seemed rather a thick fog than a cloud, no star was to be seen, while with the first fall of the snow-flocks, a sharp puff of icy wind struck them. The men's faces blanched suddenly, and they looked anxiously at the young officer.

"For a minute, he has almost struck like them by the sudden danger. Then he said, cheerily:

"We are in for a squall of snow, but well, we can't find the ship now, for in five

And again the whale started, with almost as great a rapidity as when he was first struck.

"He won't go for this time," Walton said. "Five minutes will be about the end of his tether."

It was now almost as dark as night. The thick, black cloud overhead seemed to weigh upon the water; the snow fell so thickly that the men at the steering oar could scarcely see the figure of the man at the wheel up in the bow, and the wind was blowing in sharp puffs, which cut like a knife. Suddenly the man gave a sharp cry. The men heard his cry fall on the line, and then there was a tremendous shock, which drove every man into the bottom of the boat, into which the water instantly poured. In an instant such was struggling for life.

CHAPTER IV.

For some time for the companions of the whale boat, as she dived, she dived round

In half an hour all were gathered under the boat, which proved a warm shelter after the bitter gale, which had now begun to blow with force, in half an hour every creek and rivulet was under the snow, and, although wet, there was no longer any sensation of cold.

"Now, look," Walton said, "the pipe will cheer us up. My oldish gun is all right, and my matches are dry (thanks to it). But my new one got machine and tobacco."

All had tobacco, but only three of the party found that their pipes were waterproof; second, however, had boxes, which had kept their matches dry.

"We must be careful of matches," Walton said. "No strike only two, when all the pipes are filled, and pass them round."

The pipes were soon alight, and a sense of comfort came over the party.

"What chance do you think there is of the ship's finding us, Mr. Walton?" one of them asked the man.

"Oh, one thing we may be sure," he said; "Captain Maxwell will stick to the search, if he is all the winter alone in it."

"It won't be of much use, if he doesn't find us in three or four days," the man who had asked the question said.

"Oh, nonsense!" Ben Walton said, cheerily. "We shall do very well here for a long time. We have got a warm house, and it's hard if we can't keep our own food; besides, I expect that in the morning we shall find the whale close to us. He was striking off just as he went under the boat. Besides, it's not good eating, I grant you; but hungry men might do worse."

"It's blowing a bit more steadily," Willy said, quietly, in the mean, "and the sea's getting up; but I can hold a little motion in the boat."

"So can I, Willy, but it's no use looking over it."

There was a silence for awhile, and then, on the last pipe was extinguished, the man said:

"Now, boys, we had best lie down for a sleep till tomorrow morning. There is no watch to keep. But before we do so, let us think first for our escape, and pay first for the protection of our lives."

"Ay, ay," was the response, "that's the thing to do."

Then, as the darkness which reigned in the whale boat, Ben Walton's voice went up in prayer, the steersman all joining in the devotion with their deep sighs.

"And now for a sleep," he said; "this is not the worst of beds, but I don't think it will keep me awake."

It did not. The warmth of ten bodies in an confined a good deal the better out with, and soon profound sleep, and the whole party slept soundly for many hours. Finally, they were awakened by a tremendous crash, with some of the ship's crew and out on the water under the bow of the boat, which were completely knocked in with the collision with the ice, and in making their way through the dense snow into the outer air, an extraordinary shower broke from each. The men were standing brightly, but the wind still blew fiercely, and a white carpet of snow lay deep in the water. They were in a deep bay of a steep rocky coast, and not far from the shore. They appeared to have been early started, for behind them icebergs were piled up in great confusion, one upon another, while behind all was a vast iceberg, which was still sending and spreading through the ice, and which extended right across the mouth of the bay. It was a heavy flow which, driven up by the force of this bay, had cracked against that upon which the party were encamped, which had awakened them. The wisdom of the step they had taken in placing the boat in the middle of the bay, was now apparent, for the action of the waves, and medicines with which they, had broken all large portions of the ice, which was now no more than forty yards across at the widest spot. The men looked round in amazement at the harbor in which they found themselves, and did not know whether to be sorry at the return at the new state of things, when the beds returned, cheerily.

THE MEN ATTACK THE WHALE.

minutes we shall be able to cut ten yards away. So we had better stick to our fish. Let us tell him, and better up to him; his body will give us a lot against the wind, and when Captain Maxwell leaves us, he will see it sooner than he would the boat. Give way, boys!"

The men bent to their oars, but it was no longer with the light-hearted eagerness which they had hitherto shown. They were now thirty miles from their ship, and had the prospect of passing the night in a snow storm, in the first sharp puffs of an Arctic winter. However, each felt that the words of their young officer were founded on reason, and that, for the present at least, their energies had best be devoted to the work in hand.

A quarter of an hour's rowing brought them up again to the whale, whom they did not see until the boat was within a few yards of him, as thickly was the snow-flocks now falling. The impact of the boat against him brought them alongside the fish, and two lines were plunged deeply into him.

"Back all, for just five!" Walton shouted.

Quickly as the order was obeyed, it was not just in time. The great tail was lifted high in the air, and fell with tremendous force, just missing the boat, and causing the four startled men as if they had been machine; the way on the head took them beyond the point might blow on the water, and shifting the men from the point side, the boat lay fifty yards from the whale, while the latter thrashed the water on all sides in his frenzy.

"It's his last flurry," Walton said. "We can't see him, but his blows are getting feeble. Now, by Jove! he's all spent!"

Meanwhile on to the bow of the boat which she had struck, and which was but a few yards from the water.

"Clamber up, boys," Walton shouted, cheerily, as he climbed out, followed in turn by Willy, and kept a hand to help the others up. "Catch hold of the boat, boys; we must get it up; our lives depend on it."

The ice had a partial shiver, and the water under its bow was still swelled by the wind; the men, who all saw the importance of the effort, waited not an instant after gaining the ice in throwing themselves down and jumping the startled boat.

"Now, altogether, hoist her!" cheerily, he called, for the water ran out of her, as "Now up with her!" and something about like a cheer broke from the men, as they hauled the broken boat up on to the ice. She had not turned over, and the men's jackets and some clothes were still on board her.

"But the case up, boys! there's one drifting away there!"

Willy opened into the water, took a few strokes in the air, and brought it back.

"Well done, Willy," the man said. "Now, boys, let us not have her out of hand!"

Cautiously, and shouting continually to each other, as so to keep near each other, they explored the ice-edges, and found it to be about a hundred yards across either way.

"Now, boys," the man said, "there is nothing whatever, but so to do but to keep ourselves warm. Turn the boat upside down, spread her out right over it in the ground, and then we've got a bed; the more we'll fill our services in no time. But don't drag her pretty well to the centre of the bay; for if the wind rises, the edges may get broken off."

By ARTHUR HARRIS.

CHAPTER I.

IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

More money adventures with Mrs. Mortimer, all aimed at one of the most dramatic incidents in the great thoroughfare, in a large building and especially interesting in its aspect, used as a lodging and boarding-house. It is very far from fashionable, more, with hardly an exception, those who avail themselves of its accommodations looking upon the great place where they are compelled to seek their beds before they get it. Mechanics, workmen, clerks in small salaries, seamstresses, and specimens of decayed gentility, all find a place beneath its roof, forming a somewhat miscellaneous assemblage. It would not be supposed, however, that poverty rapidly rules even here. It is often remarked, that social distinctions are more judiciously maintained in the lower ranks than in the higher. Here, for instance, Alphonse Fontaine, a dashing young clerk, who occupies the first floor front, looks down with disdain upon the industrious mechanic, who sleeps in the second story back. Mathewson Finckhette, the handsome man, occupying the second story front, considers it beneath his dignity to hold much intercourse with Martha Gray, the pale seamstress, whose small room at the head of the third landing affords a delightful prospect of the back yard. Even the occupants of the fourth story look down, which, indeed, their elevated position enables them to do, upon the basement lodgers across the way.

Mother Morton is the presiding genius of the establishment. She is a stout, leading woman, of considerable business capacity; one of those real-time characters to whom nothing is so trifling as want of companions, and who are never more in their element than when they have a world of business on their hands, with little time to do it in.

Mrs. Morton is a widow, having, with characteristic despatch, married her husband out of the world in less than four years from her wedding ceremony. She was, however, obliged to seek a substitute in some way, good luck suggested the expediency of opening a boarding-house. Here, at length, she found scope for her exceptional energy, and in the course of seventeen years had succeeded in accumulating several thousand dollars, by the investment of which she had sought advice from no one, but acted according to the dictates of her own judgment. These investments it must be acknowledged, proved to have been wisely made, affording a complete refutation, in one case, at least, of the maxim often made, that women have no business capacity.

Why Mrs. Morton should have had the taste of mother, as generally understood upon here is not quite clear. She had never been blessed with children. It might have been her simple propensities, for Nature had moulded her with a generous mood; but at all events for many years, she had been known by the name of Mother Morton.

Our landlady required promptness on the part of her lodgers in the payment of their bills. She had no mercy on those whom she suspected of fraudulent intentions. In such cases she had but one remedy, and that a most efficacious one—immediate ejection. When, however, her credit was unimpaired, and failure to make the regular payment proceeded from sickness or misfortune, she had been known to manifest great kindness and consideration. When, for example, Martha Gray, the young seamstress, was stricken down by a fever, induced by overwork, Mother Morton attended her faithfully during her illness, and so far from looking on a crisis change, even recalled her rent for the time she had been ill.

With these preliminary words our story begins.

The dinner hour had passed. The last figure at the table had left the scene of debauch, which he had contributed to make, and the landlady, who experienced the clearing away, had just sent away the last dish, when her attention was arrested by a faint ring at the door bell. Hastily slipping her dress before the glass, she proceeded to answer the summons in person.

Opening the door, she was standing before her a young girl of perhaps fourteen, and a man, who, though but little over four, looked nearly ten years older. The little girl is mentioned first, for, in spite of her youth, and the filial relation, which she bore to her companion, she was the spokesman, and appeared to feel that the responsibility in the present instance fell upon her. There was a copious air of protection in her manner toward her father, as if the relationship between them some twelve feet square, neatly provided with furniture. Its furniture was, in some measure, relieved by a good supply of light—there being two windows.

The girl was anxiously accustomed to look on the bright side of things; for, instead of seeing on the darkness and inconvenience of the apartment, her face brightened, and she said, cheerfully, "Just what we want, isn't it, papa? But how bright and pleasant it is."

These applied to her father answered, "Yes, certainly," and collapsed into his former abstraction.

"I think," said the young girl, addressing the landlady, "that we will engage the room; that is," she added with hesitation, "if the rent isn't too high."

"WE'LL TAKE THE ROOM," SHE SAID TO MOTHER MORTON.

were reversed, and he was the child.

"You have lodgings to let?" she said, in a tone of inquiry.

"We're pretty full, now," said Mother Morton, looking with some curiosity at the eager face of the young questioner. "All our best rooms are taken."

"That makes no difference," said the young girl, "where the best room, I mean. We are not able to pay much."

She cast a glance at her father, who was an abstracted look as if he were thinking of some matter quite foreign to the matter in hand. Catching her glance, and thinking that an appeal was made to him to make haste, he said, "Yes, my child, you are quite right. We are not able to pay much."

"I wonder whether he's in the right mind," thought the practical Mrs. Morton. "The little girl seems to be worth two of him."

"I have one room in the fourth story," she said aloud, "which is now vacant. It is rather small; but, if it will suit you, you shall have it cheaper than that second."

"I should like to see it," said the child. "Come, father," taking him by the hand and leading him as if she were the older, "we're going up stairs to look at a room, child, perhaps, we may like well enough to hire."

At the head of the fourth landing the landlady threw open a door, revealing a room,

Mother Morton had been interested in the child's behalf by the mingling of frank simplicity and worldly wisdom, which she exhibited and perhaps not least by the quiet air of protection which she assumed toward her father, for whom it was evident she entertained the deepest and most devoted affection. In answer, which she did not pause to question, but her to name a rent much less than she had been accustomed to receive for the room.

"One dollar and seventy-five cents week," repeated the child. "Yes, that is reasonable. I think we had better engage the room; don't you, papa?"

"I think we had better engage this room at one dollar and seventy-five cents a week."

"Oh, certainly. That is, by all means, if you think best, my child. You know I have all such matters to you. I have no more other things to think of," he added, domineeringly, waving his hand to his forehead.

"Yes," said the child, softly, "I know you have, dear papa."

"We'll take the room," she said to Mother Morton, whose curiosity unconsciously increased, and then, with a look of decision, she went down stairs, and with her

"Oh, no! but you baggage. You will need to bring that."

"We have not much to bring. We shall get it tomorrow."

"You will board yourselves?" asked the landlady.

"Yes, I shall cook. I am quite used to it," was the grave reply.

At this point, however, she did not like to be brought, "I will send you up some supper."

"Thank you," said the child, her face lighting up gratefully. "I am sure you are very kind," and she laid out her hand in Mother Morton's acknowledgments.

If Mother Morton had before been prepared to let her terms, this act, so frank and child-like, completed the conquest of her tender heart.

"I am very glad," said she, quite forgetting in her own broad pulse the little hand which she had extended.

"I am very glad, my dear child, that you are going to live here. I think I shall like you."

"How kind you are!" said the child, earnestly. "Somebody is kind to father and me," and she turned toward her parents, who were getting abstractedly from the window.

"Your father does not say much," said Mrs. Morton, unable to suppress her curiosity.

"He has a great deal on his mind," said the child, lowering her voice, and looking earnestly to see whether he loved her; but the report of a pistol would scarcely have distracted him, so profound seemed his meditation.

"Oh!" said the landlady, somewhat surprised. "Business, is it?"

"No," said the child; "not exactly business."

Observing that the landlady looked thoroughly interested, she added, quietly, "Papa has a great deal to be thinking of. He is going to make a discovery that will give him money and honor. He is thinking about it all the time, and that is the reason he doesn't say much. I wish he wouldn't think quite so much, for I am afraid it will hurt him."

Mother Morton looked at the father with a sudden accession of respect.

"Perhaps there is something in him, after all," she thought. "There must be, for this little girl, who has a great deal more sense than money that are older, wouldn't believe in him so firmly. I suppose he's a genius. I've heard of such, but I never saw one before. I must think well of him for the child's sake."

"I hope your father'll succeed," she said aloud. "Is your name, my child, I am going down stairs now. Is there anything you would like to have sent up?"

"Nothing, thank you."

"One thing more. Your name, please?"

"My father's name is Robert Ford. My name is Helen."

"Good afternoon, Helen. I hope you will like your room."

"Thank you; I am quite used to it."

The landlady descended the stairs, wondering a little at the child, who she began to feel for her young lodger.

CHAPTER II.

THE MORTIMER.

The light of a fine morning lent a warm and cheerful look to the broad streets, and under its influence even the dingy lanes and alleys looked a little less gloomy than usual. The spell which had laid upon the city during the night season was broken. Here and there might be seen a respectable cart or a milk wagon rumbling through the streets, or late on silent and deserted. Sleepy clerks walked the streets and sidewalks, and swept them in readiness for the business of the day. Mortimer broke themselves in the morning landings in the hope of obtaining a few better lodgings. Creaking and bumping old wagons and heavy carriages where they had been able to procure shelter and lodging, came the pedestrians, those specially adapted to our modern civilization. Little time wasted they on the doors of the hotels, but about themselves wide awake, and with the keen instinct of trade, hurried to the

CHAPTER IV.

A CHILDED BACKGROUND.

It was growing late. Night had drawn its mantle over the great city, and the streets, a little while before filled with busy pedestrians, now seemed but solitary to the steps of an occasional traveler. The shops were closed, the long day seemed to have been over. To please and to have leisure, to leisure every with calculating talent, to make increased by anxious care, might come in friendly guise, bringing the rest and temporary oblivion of sleep.

From a small building in a by-street, or rather lane, which nevertheless was not far removed from the main thoroughfare, there glided a solitary figure, wearing a dark gown, which served, so far as it went, to give a very unfavorable idea of the immediate vicinity. Within a young man, possibly thirty, was seated at a small table, writing a legal document. The face was not an agreeable one. The prevailing expression was one of discontent and weak repining. He was one who could complain of circumstances without having the energy to control them; he was to be a subordinate of others and never doing anything.

He wrote with regularity and, at the same time, with scrupulous elegance. He was evidently a professional writer.

After bending over his writing for a time, during which he was rapidly approaching the completion of his task, he at length threw aside the pen, reclining with an air of relief. "So that it is finished! Thanks Heaven! that is," he added, after a slight pause. "I have in each a place, which I can sometimes maintain to death. Finished! but what after all is a single day's work! To-night I may sleep in peace, but to-morrow the work must begin once more. It is like a treadmill continually going round, but making no real progress. I wish," he murmured, after a slight pause, "there were some way of breaking suddenly right, without this wear and tear of hand and brain. I don't know that I am as much surprised at the election of those who, in other respects of talent, have not demonstrated to the world their ability. They should have been born with such a keen enjoyment of business, and without the means of obtaining them? Why should I be discontented with my lot?"

When discontent had thus opened the way for its favorable reception, inspiration came. There was a knock at the door.

Thinking it might be some errand boy, he called out, in his interrogatory, was wondering how he knew not whether he did not at that moment, but waited till it should be repeated. It was repeated, this time with a considerable degree of force.

The young man approached the door, but finding apprehensions that it might prove to be some unwelcome visitor, he passed before drawing the bolt, and called out, in a voice marked by a tremulous quiver, for his person and but little physical courage. "Who are you that come here at such an unreasonable hour? Unless I know your name, I shall not let you in."

"Don't be alarmed, Jack," was the reply. "It is only I, Lewis Rand, upon an errand, but I come on business which must be quickly despatched."

The explanation was entirely satisfactory, for the servant in eager haste opened the door, and admitted his guest. He was the younger of the two men upon whom the chance meeting with Helen and her father seemed to have produced an impression as powerful. Jack, though well acquainted with him, was evidently surprised at his presence at so late an hour, and, as he explained, in a tone of mingled surprise and dejection. "You know, Mr. Rand, and at this time of night! It is not for nothing I suppose that you have called upon me at an hour when most men are quietly sleeping in their beds."

"Let me see up, Jack, and at work, as I comprehend," said the visitor, pointing to the table on which the completed document was still lying.

"Time," said the copyist, for this needed to him the grounds of his document. "But I mean work while others sleep, or accept a moment's repose. Sometimes I am tempted to give up the struggle. You have never known what a hard taskmaster poverty is."

"Perhaps not," returned the other. "But I can testify that the apprehension of poverty is not less formidable. However, I can perhaps lend you a helping hand, since the house on which I come, if successfully carried out, of which with your cooperation I have strong hopes, will prove an important one to that I shall be able to put a better face upon your affairs."

"Ah!" said the young man, with suddenly revivified interest. "What may it be?"

"Jack," said his visitor, fixing his eyes steadily upon the servant, "you know there is an old maxim, 'Nothing venture, nothing have.' In other words, he who aims to be successful in his undertakings, must not scruple to employ the means best suited to advance his interests, even though they may involve the sacrifice of domestic happiness. Do you comprehend my meaning?"

"Not entirely. At least, I need to be in-some of hand, an incident has occurred which threatens to disarrange all my plans, and dis-fracture me of all but a state of that which I have long looked upon as my sole inducement."

"Surely, your uncle has no nearer relative than yourself?" exclaimed Jack, in surprise.

"That is what the world thinks, but they are deceived. My uncle has a son, and that son has a daughter. You see, therefore, that there is my back of home. But you need an explanation."

"My father died when I was not quite five years of age. He was what is called a gay man, and spent freely what property he possessed in extravagant living, and, last but not least, in dissipation. He had large debts at the time of his death. He died in an effort to settle which grew out of a dispute with one of his gambling acquaintances, leaving, as my inheritance, a few debts, and nothing."

Since, indebted from his English ancestors, that his estate should be handed down to his third generation, to generation, would indeed have been a very desirable thing. I could not break my uncle's superior prospects, and determined to lighten him with my uncle, if an opportunity should occur."

"The opportunity came. My uncle fell in love with a beautiful girl, who, but for her poverty, would have attracted no one. This, however, proved an unexpected obstacle. I wanted the attachment had ripened into the most ardent affection, and then I made it known, to my uncle with all the methodicalness which I thought best calculated to secure his attention. The object of my uncle's attachment I described as an orphaned country girl, without cultivation or refinement."

"It was a heavy blow to my uncle's pride, for he had cherished high hopes for his son, and aspired to an alliance with a family as old and distinguished as his own. In the expectation of the moment, he consulted Robert in his, and presumptuously insisted on his at once giving up his attachment, signifying that the object of it was such terms as I had employed in describing her. My country's spirit was instantly roused by such manifest injustice, and he refused to accede to his father's wishes. The discussion was a stormy one, and terminated as I had feared, and he died in wrath. My cousin went forth from the house, disowned and disinherited, and I remained, filling his place as heir."

Jack surveyed the speaker with a glance of admiration. He paid homage to a woman, which surprised his eye. He admired his resolution and address, while his want of principle did not repel him.

"What became of your cousin?" inquired the servant, after a pause.

"He married and went out West. He purchased a small property in the State of New York, and this enabled him to live in a humble way. I have heard little of him since, except that he had but one child, a daughter, who must now be near the fourteenth year of age. This I learned from a letter of her father's which I intercepted."

"But your uncle never shows any signs of relenting?" asked Jack.

"Two years ago, he was very sick and it was thought he might die. During that sickness he referred so often to his son that I began to tremble for my position in the family. Accordingly I procured a notice of his death to be inserted in a Chicago paper, which I took care to show my uncle. The authenticity of this he never doubted, and, accordingly, I felt that my chances were no good as ever. But within the last week a fact has come to my knowledge which fills me with alarm."

"The report looked up indignantly."

"It is true," returned Lewis. "Not only in my cousin's living, but he is in this city. Furthermore my uncle has seen him, and yet for superstitious reasons that he was mistaken, and my cousin to his resolution that Robert's death was well attended, he would have taken immediate measures for finding him out. If found, he would be at once reinstated in his inheritance, and I should be reduced to the position of a humble dependant upon my uncle's bounty."

"But you have escaped the danger, and all is well again."

"By no means. Notwithstanding my representation, my uncle clings obstinately to the belief that either he or some child of his may be living, and only yesterday issued a new will to be drawn up, leaving his bulk of his estate to his son or his son's issue; and, adding thereto, to me. You will readily see how I stand affected by this. Of course, in the event of my uncle's death, a search will be immediately instituted for my cousin and his daughter, and, being in the city, they will probably be found."

"Your prospects are certainly not of the most encouraging character," said Jack, after a pause. "But, if I may venture to inquire, what measure have you that seek in the recovery of your uncle's will?"

"This," replied Rand, taking from a side pocket a piece of parchment tied with a blue ribbon, and leisurely unrolling it. Jack watched his movements with interest.

"This," said he, holding a searching glance upon the servant, as if to read his feelings. "This is my uncle's will."

"The report could not repay a start of astonishment."

"This will?" he exclaimed. "How did you obtain possession of it?"

"I COME," HE SAID.

"GIVE ME THE WILL."

formed of the conversation between which has just been said and the service you require at my hands."

"You shall presently know. But first you make me seriously that what I may say, and my proposition I may make to you to-night, shall forever remain a secret between us two."

The customer made the required promise, though his wonder was not a little excited by the extraordinary language and significant tone of his companion.

"I promise," he said. "You may proceed. I am ready."

"You are quite alone, I suppose," said Lewis, hesitatingly. "There is no fear of interruption?"

"Not the least," replied Jack, nodding to himself in an undertone. "Should need be that asleep, I think. You need be under no apprehensions," he said, aloud. "We shall not be disturbed."

At this moment a small clock over the mantel struck ten.

"Two o'clock!" exclaimed Lewis. "I had not expected it so late."

THE MOUNTAIN CAVE;

The Mystery of the Sierra Nevada.

By GEORGE A. MORTON.

CHAPTER I.

THE MOUNTAIN CAVE.

The stage coach made its way laboriously, for the road was difficult. It was under the very shadow of the Sierra Nevada. The passengers were weary, and some nervous shaggy.

Suddenly the general landlubber was thrown on his back on the road.

"It was only two months ago that my father was killed at all his property," said a bright-eyed girl of fifteen, who occupied the left-hand corner of the rear seat.

A few, manly-looking boys, some who crowded in the forward part of the coach, raised his hand quickly, answering the fair young passenger with an expression of sympathy.

Every one manifested an eager curiosity, and the girl's cheeks flushed as she saw what attention she had drawn to herself.

"All his property?" exclaimed a female passenger, to whom the remark had seemed to be addressed.

"How sorry I am for you!" Was it a large amount?

"Yes, sir, it was very large."

"Was it in gold, sir?" queried a man.

"Yes, sir, all in gold."

"Way up, among the Sierras, you say, sir?" put in a second lady.

"Yes, sir."

"All his property? That was hard on him."

"It was very hard, sir."

"Killed, I think you said, sir?" put in a somewhat elderly man who sat next to the boy.

"Pity, how old it happens!"

"The gold was on board an express train, sir, and the train was loaded by a band of masked robbers."

"Two months ago? No doubt I must have read of it."

"Yes, sir, it was in all the papers."

"Let's see—two months ago—there are so many such robberies here—two months ago, and your father lost—how much did you say?"

"A hundred thousand dollars, sir."

"A hundred thousand dollars! Is it possible?"

"Yes, sir, a hundred thousand dollars in gold."

"Where?" came from the crowd of passengers, and there was a low whistle as of incredulity from one or two of them. But a something in the young and truly beautiful face was calculated to check this demonstration.

"A hundred thousand dollars in gold?" repeated half a dozen voices.

"Money on me? What a doubtful loss? came from the lady passenger."

"And your father has nothing left?"

"Nothing, sir; he had sold all his interest in the mine, and this was his whole property."

"What I pity you! Oh, if such villainy could be brought to justice!"

"That's a big job!" said one of the miners.

"Enough to make a man feel like passing in his ship," said another.

"I'll like to get my revenge on the scoundrels," remarked a third.

"Yes, I remember reading of it," said the elderly man, "and how your father, Mr. your father, no doubt it was—My—"

"My father," pronounced the girl.

"Yes, you know a Mr. Morton had lost all his property. It is a shame that such things should be."

"No, sir, not the least. The robbers are taken, and nothing is known of them."

"It is a hard case," suggested the elderly man; "there is a great deal of mystery about these robberies."

On all sides there were expressions of sympathy for the beautiful young girl as evidence of robbery from robbery to poverty. But perhaps the look in the back, giving eye of the boy upon the front and told more than all else.

"Chatterbox!" he exclaimed, as if half to himself. "All the carriage of a lifetime! Oh, how I would like to have the villain done!"

"No doubt, no doubt," said the elderly man, "as we all would, but I fear it would prove a very long hunt. The poor ladies, he—"

"How beautifully gloomy it is getting!" said the lady passenger.

"Yes," replied the young girl; "I hope there are no robbers about."

"I hope so too. Do wonder you think of them?" sympathized with you so much, my dear sister."

"Thank you. It is nonsense. I suppose my father is wandering where Bland is to-night."

"Oh, no," thought Walter Barton, "he has gone to Bland. Don't think I shall forget that."

"Bessie got a snuff of a bar," called the driver from his seat, as if he felt someone and in need of sympathy.

"Bessie! Oh!" said Bland.

"Bessie! For money sake?" asked the other.

"Never has, father," said one of the men, "how much's a stage?"

"Never known 'em to," remarked another.

Walter tried to look out from the open window, but he was too far forward to reach it.

"Begin to feel foolish?" asked the elderly man.

"No, sir, only I thought if there was a robbery about, I would like to see him."

"You are in the wrong place."

"Yes, I thought of that when we were talking about the robbers."

"Well, it wouldn't do you much good, outside or in, if they were to show themselves. Best policy is to take it easy."

The horses went very fast for a few minutes, then apparently coming to a stop and being moved, they wheeled their pace to a walk, and their heads bowed as if they were taking hold of the hard road.

"Stump, stump, stump!" as they talked up.

The driver, on both sides looked furiously back, and it was pitch dark in the stage.

The driver again looked at the moral support which the consciousness of his being quite alone could give him, and once or twice he glanced back at his companion's head or feet, level enough in his level for side.

"Yes, 'twas grander back, then," he said, "chatterbox!" and his reply cracked like a pistol.

"There's a whole lot more, I have it! Oh, my!"

"What long horse rider that driver was killed a year ago," remarked someone, coming up.

"The robbers had it—"

But the sentence was left unfinished. A terrible groan required attention.

"Shade up!"

"What a cry it was! Four tramped, panting riders, and the rear of a dark lantern fell still upon the front of the stage. The horses started and reared up, then came to a dead stand. There were strong hands upon the reins.

The men grasped their pistols, the lady passenger screamed, and from the dark corner where the young girl was huddled four more pistols flashed that showed her dreadfully frightened face.

Walter thought of his gun on the top of the stage. Oh, if he had had it now!

"Not with," said the elderly man, "you can't do anything. For what they want."

But even he was clanking his pistol, for the boy's hand touched the barrel as he shifted his position.

In a moment, however, it could be seen how vain was any show of resistance. Theirs or their rifle was also was pointing in at each of the opposite doors of the stage, and the driver was already standing on the ground, a helpless prisoner.

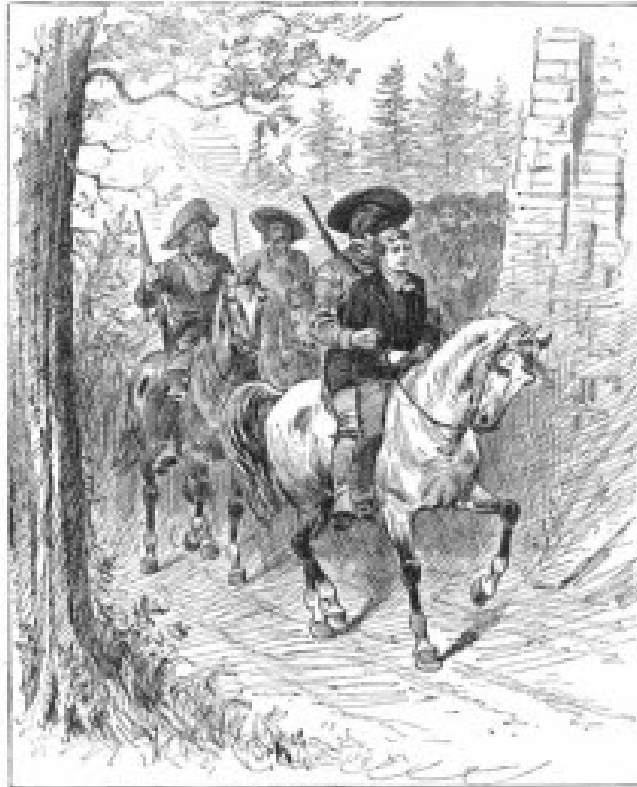

Some of the passengers who had weapons surrendered them, and then the whole group, one after another, descended. They did so they were thankful by the masked robbers and almost thankful by the silent men.

"Let's get the drop on us, and a can't be helped!" muttered the elderly man grimly, as he looked around upon his captors.

The scene, as revealed by the lantern glare, was a confused and strange one. Here and there a robber was looking from the others and roughly interrogated. Expressly was this the case with the elderly passenger, who appeared to receive very early treatment.

Walter Barton saw the stage thoroughly searched, and among other things, his perfectly finished rifle taken from its place to be examined and admired. It was a birthday present from his father, and it would not have parted with it for a thousand dollars.

The next of all, the boy's attention was directed to poor little trembling Bland; for he aided, "in Walter Barton, and you are out on a long vacation, as you say."

"Yes, sir, I shall not go home for some time."

"How your father was suffered from those robberies that are so often talked of?"

"Yes, once or twice, to the amount of a few thousands; but his loss has been nothing in comparison to Mr. Morton's."

And he made another look at the girl's pretty face.

"Twilight was now closing around, and the stage had still far to go. The road seemed to grow wilder as coming westward, and a sense of insecurity was apparent among the passengers."

"Thought you you alone, I presume?" said Walter's elderly friend.

"They generally have shooting."

"Oh, certainly, wouldn't come along with out my rifle, it's stored on the top of the stage, a repeater, and a very good one, I think."

When he guessed that she might be motherless, because nothing was said of her mother, and he wondered that the women did not ask her about it, or inquire her destination. But he finally concluded that she might have told no more without her having it, before she spoke of the robbery.

"A hundred thousand dollars in gold!" murmured a passenger in the darkness, as if he had been dwelling upon that idea from the first.

"That was a big job!"

And Walter guessed him to be the same miner who had called it "a big job" once before.

"Any dust in particular about this stage?" repeated another voice.

"Take enough, unless that may be."

"Gave I'm thinking," said the driver, "that we're a goner into a nice place to robbed it, if it be."

"Happy! what a trade!" said the woman.

"That's all!" said the stage upon it!" asked poor little Bland, pleadingly.

WRECKED IN GUINEA.

BY HENRY J. MURPHY.

At the time our ship was wrecked in the night of Guine, in the west coast of Africa, our progress was gloomy enough.

We had several one and some other articles, but what was to be our fate in the deep wilderness, or what career we ought to pursue to get out of it, it was hard to say. Not a native was to be seen, and we did not believe there was a single village anywhere in our neighborhood.

We thrashed all the next day, night of us, keeping near the shore in order not to get any more lost than we already were, but no human creature was to be seen.

At one spot we started a lion. He ran into some tall reeds, then turned around and looked at us. He had a yellow body and brown mane, and the picture he made, with his huge head and shoulders framed about by the shade reeds, was not one which it was pleasant to look at just then.

I suppose, however, that he was as much afraid of us as we were of him; at least he did not offer to leave his covert, but stood there staring at us like a ghost, though the prowling from a feline animal.

Just at night we came upon a leopard with three cubs; but the whole family scampered off the shore bounding about by the side of the old one like no many felines at the call of the mother cat. The cubs would come out to entice them, and probably a parent who should have picked up one of these felines would have had an unpleasant time of it.

That night, as we lay under the trees, a troop of animals came close about us, as if to molest our position. We had no weapons except a hatchet and our knives, but we got up and stood on the deck. The animals made a strange noise that had some resemblance to human laughter, and the captain called them hyenas. Probably they would not have attacked a troop of us, just as we were, but they would have taken up more highly had we been dead about a week. After a time we made a sudden dash towards them, upon which they ran off like mice, and we were safe.

On the day following we got too far from the coast, and after that became completely lost. We had taken with us the ship's compass, but the captain, who carried it, had let it fall, and completely missed it by putting his hand on it.

The sun was hidden by clouds all day, so that we knew not north from south, or whether we were approaching the coast or going from it. Our only food was a little bread and some salt codfish, which we had secured from the wreck, and our condition was really miserable.

Towards night we came to a sort of natural opening in the woods, where there were only a few trees standing wide apart. One of our men also lay upon the ground, having, perhaps, fallen from some old tree, for it had upon it a black of moss which was actually remarkable.

Under the huge trunk, as if by accident a disposition of the ground, there was nearly room enough to stand upright. We examined the place thoroughly before choosing it for our camp, and then creeping under the moss, that hung about on like a tent, lay down to rest. The position was one which would effectively hide us from the observation of wild beasts, so that we would be able to rest in security until morning.

A number of them during the night we heard horns rumbling at a distance, but they did not come very near. As nothing started, we spoke and sat up with the great tree trunk over us and the moss hanging down in a strange, rick canopy.

We were about morning, for we had been so long asleep, that we had slept long.

The captain rose to his feet, stretched himself, and was upon the point of going out. He parted the moss, put his hand through the opening, and was just beginning to look about him, when about us there was a sort of shrieking noise that was enough to make one's hair rise.

"My name?" he continued, drawing himself back.

"What is it, sir?" asked two or three of the men of crew.

"It's the first time I believe," he replied. "I just look out there and see it. We did look, and I shall never forget the third the night given me. There, about twenty yards off, wringing himself from a branch of a large tree, was one of the most hideous monkeys that it is possible for the imagination to conceive.

The creature looked like a gigantic old at man, a lion, or an elephant would have been welcome in company with him.

There was barely time to get a good stare of the monster, when he leaped in our direction from a short distance, and immediately a second gorilla made its appearance, approaching the first upon all-fours.

In this last was somewhat smaller than the other, we believed, the two to be male and female. The gorilla, however, was not so delicate but that even she would have been a match for the whole of us together in a fair fight.

The old patriarch roared, as if telling her of the strange discovery he had made while at home, and then both the creatures sprang upon the old trunk above us, where they commenced making in a most frightful manner than ever.

While wondering what this could portend, we were all at once startled by a crash of branches only a few rods off, and quickly following the report there was a fall upon the log, succeeded by a sound of desperate struggling. This a heavy body rolled down through the moss to the ground.

The volley was immediately repeated, and there came a second fall, with another dead fell from the log.

Looking out, what was our joy to discover four white men approaching us. Their movements at our sudden appearance, in such a place and under such circumstances, was great. At first they mistook their rifles, thinking we had some other order of beings as those they had shot, but when we had thrown off the moss that clung about our heads, their plans were quickly reversed.

They were a party of English officers belonging to a merchant-ship on the coast, who had just coming started out for a hunt, getting off at an early hour from their vessel in order to have the advantage of the cooler morning air.

From them we learned that we were not made that a mile from the coast, and they offered to go with one of ours to their vessel.

The singularity of their advent here, when as a whole, seemed fairly to horrify them. "To think," said one of them, "that we should have found a whole ship even in what we thought a sort of paradise! It is lucky that we didn't let any of you when we met those eight bullets over your heads."

"That would have been rather wild talk," responded another; "we are not quite so bad, either as to have done that."

The two gorillas were pulled out from the moss, and as the four gentlemen wished to show their trophies just as they were, we offered our assistance in getting the thick-skinned things to the vessel.

The Englishmen and ourselves numbered twelve, and, hanging the strange prizes upon poles, two of which were placed on either side, we succeeded in getting them to the water side.

The curiosity of the English crew was extreme when the monkeys were taken off to the ship. It being, however, impossible to give even the commonest, they were chained with great care and taken to the vessel.

We were soon after put on board a United States ship-of-war, which took us in to Cape Palmas.

UNFINDABLE REMAINS.

Thomas, five years, the French naturalist, who died a few years ago, showed only in a great love of animals, the natural outcome of every day's life. He was a considerable boy with no less of looks. He had been discharged from three schools before he was six years old, partly on account of a habit of playing truant, and partly because he showed inclination to follow his father, who was a hunter and a collector of animals. He was sent to a military school at the age of six. At eleven he was appointed to a schoolmaster, and at the age of thirteen he had gone through many severe trials. He joined the militia, but his love of nature proved him to be his military studies. When at still one day a butterfly fluttered past, and Edward, forgetting the discipline, broke from the ranks, pursued and captured the insect. He was brought back a prisoner and subsequently discharged. In his twentieth year Edward went to study in a schoolmaster at Paris, and there he passed an unusually his education in natural history that he added a great deal to his scientific store of knowledge. When he married, at the age of twenty-three, his wife was also a student of science, and he had to work with her in the field and over, searching for insects and strange things. For fifteen years Edward passed his time at his connection by night, and he had many narrow escapes through the dangers with which he pursued his object.

BEHINDING HIMSELF FROM A BRANCH OF A TREE, HE SAW A MONKEY COMING.

black man, who might have been in the world ever since Adam! It had an immense head, wide short, broadish ears, and a bright, full, brown face that seemed the very incarnation of malignity.

His arms were longer than his legs, and he looked as if they could crush two or three of us into one, making their ribs snap like dry sticks. His body was of a disgusting shape, large and short; and his feet, that we could see dangling as it swung, had the appearance of huge, claw-like hands. Indeed, they seemed almost exactly like the hands of a coat of long black hair covered the whole of his body from head to foot.

It may have been our voices, and then appeared out from behind the captain looked out, but it seemed to have been the sight of him that caused it to rise. It could not see us particularly as we peered through the moss, and its intention was made manifest by a succession of human words that seemed more like a snarling bark than anything else.

We all felt that the animal must be a gorilla, though no one of us had ever before seen a specimen of the race. Our knowledge of its character, however, did not tend to put us also replied in a voice which had very little of human softness in its tones.

After a time the frightful monster quitted the tree to which he had been clinging, and followed by his mate, came close to our hiding place, so if curious to know more of its movements.

We drew in our heads and stood ready with our hatchets and knives.

"Don't hit them," said the captain, "we lost their attack us. It might make them nervous."

They clattered in a kind of surprised way, at these roaring outcries, and finally began to pull away the moss that surrounded us. Then the old male put in his ugly face, showing long, white teeth, such as would not be found in the jaws of the largest mastiff.

There was a look in his eyes that was indescribable, but still he hesitated to come within our reach. Forgetting our faces, so different in color from anything he had ever seen before, seemed him to wonder what sort of beings we were, and whether or not it would be safe to pick a quarrel with us.

Presently his mate, as she remarked above behind him, gave a loud, piercing yell. It was instant he started back out of the moss

It was the usual dog-watch—the only hours on shipboard that are devoted to fun and relaxation. Happier was even, the boats had been loaded at last, the loading parties tried up, and the head and windward men composing the crew, with the exception and been called upon for the usual dog-watch. The face of every one on board, from the captain down to the youngest wardroom boy, wore an expression of anxiety, and which I come to tell you just how they were situated and what they were trying to do, you will not wonder at it. The crew of the gunboat Devil had been through many a hard-fought battle on the Mississippi and the tributary streams—but they had never been in so much danger as they were at that moment. They did not know at what instant the springing of the mine might call them to quarters to fight for their lives, and to defend their vessel from the assault of war.

"I wonder if any boat ever went through here before," said the young ensign, as he and his companions waited up and down the main deck, with their hands behind their backs.

"Oh, yes," replied the respondent. "The stream that runs through these swamps are all navigable for light-draft boats, and there was a good deal of traffic down this country and Tennessee before the war. There were a large number of plantations through here then, and they raised big crops of cotton and corn."

"They must have done their farm work with boats instead of mules," said the ensign.

"The water is three feet deep all over the lowlands."

"More than that in some places," answered Chipp. "The Mississippi is an high. And McPherson's corps, which is supposed to be operating with Grant against Vicksburg, is at Lake Providence, seventy miles away. They can't find dry ground to camp on any nearer than that. But you must remember that this has been an uncommon winter for high water and heavy rains, and that the levees that were built to protect the country from overflow have not been touched since the war began. More than that, they have been cut in several places to let the water of the river flow into the bayous, so that our gunboats could make overland expeditions."

"And what have they succeeded in?" asked the ensign, in a tone of disgust. "The attempt to get the boats down to Red River by way of Lake Providence has proved a failure; the batteries at Holms Bluff were altogether too strong for us; the Yocco Pass expedition has been whipped and driven back; go philosophizing off through the woods, as we are doing now."

The speaker was a tall, young man in uniform, dressed in the uniform of an ensign. The companion whom he called "Chipp" was an elderly man, who was of the few that were on duty, were gathered on the gun deck, smoking their pipes and conversing in low and grumbled tones. There was no laughing or shouting, no loud noise of any sort. The hands and voices were silent, and for three days the boatmen's note had been called upon for the usual dog-watch. The crew of the gunboat Bowen had been through many a hard-fought battle on the Mississippi and the tributary streams—but they had never been in so much danger as they were at that moment. They did not know at what instant the springing of the mine might call them to quarters to fight for their lives, and to the boat their vessel from the assault of war.

"I wonder if any boat ever went through here before," said the young ensign, as he and his companions waited up and down the main deck, with their hands behind their backs.

"Oh, yes," replied the warrant officer, "the steamers that run through these waters are all warlike, but little cotton traders, and there was a small fleet of traffic down between this country and Vicksburg before the war. There were a large number of plantations

A SCARLET PANTHER.

By GEORGE H. COOMER.

SOME portions of the Red River country, in Louisiana, are as wild and lonely as the banks of the Niger or the Congo. Game is abundant there, and danger lurks at every turn in the hunter's path.

I was quite aware of the nature of the region, and for this very reason nothing could have delighted me more than an invitation which I received to visit it.

This invitation was a very casual one, and came from a former school-mate of mine, named Frank Atwood, who, with his partner, was living near the Red River about thirty miles above Sulphur Springs.

Upon receiving of Mr. Atwood's plantation, I was received with a warm greeting by the family. Frank and I were almost exactly of the same age, there being a difference of only a few days, and our tastes were as nearly alike as our ages.

I had brought along a new Winchester rifle, purchased by the occasion, and he examined it with all a young hunter's enthusiasm, pronouncing it the very thing required for use in such a country.

"It is just like mine," he said. "I don't see a shotgun much. My Winchester '11 put a ball through my shotgun as far off as I can see him. There are hundreds of these fellows in the bottom, and we'll have the sport with them. Then, too, there are coons, and opossums, and bats, all about the woods. I've shot eight bats since we've lived here, and you'll be very likely to get a chance at one in a short time."

"Have you seen a panther yet?" I asked. "No; but I've heard one; at least, I think it was a panther. I've heard something cry out in a strange way, but I never could find the creature."

"You spoke in your last letter," I said, "of some animal that one of the negroes had seen, that frightened him almost to death."

"Oh, yes; the negro in old Cuba; he works for Mr. Wilson, on the next plantation. He tells a frightful story of an animal all over the place, that he met with in the woods. A scared negro, you know, runs as almost through anything. He might have got a glimpse of a panther, but I guess it wasn't a spotted one. Who ever heard of a spotted one? A panther is bright red."

"There may be white ones," I remarked, "but I don't believe there was ever a spotted panther."

"Not a white one," said Frank. "It is all nonsense. Uncle Otto said the old thing didn't see him. I have to sleep last night."

CHAPTER I.

A mountain scene.

On bright autumn morning, toward the close of the last century, three men were seen among the foothills of the Great Mountains looking down into a valley toward which they had been journeying for several days. They had met with many stirring adventures on the way, and more than once a flock of them, at least, would fall in "get through." They had passed on, however, and here at last in this time morning they felt they were near their journey's end.

The three youths were Fred Larkin, a sturdy young fellow about sixteen years old, Thomas Clark, his best comrade, a stout young fellow from the same town, and Oliver Larkin, his brother, a young fellow from the same town. They were a hundred miles away, and as Indian youth, having no further the mountains. Perhaps it is a wonderful something about him.

The young men were in the distance, about as high as a hill, off into the interior of the mountains, one of whom was the father of Fred

CHASED BY A MOOSE.

By GEORGE H. BROWN.

"Yes, you live with the woods, I have doubt?" said pretty Isabel Campbell, with a nervous laugh, as she looked up from the little picture which she was handling. "I shall expect to see you some time leading a moose as high as a small elephant!"

Isabel was Bob Campbell's sister, and Bob was not alone. I had become acquainted with him in Boston, where he had induced my love of hunting to the highest pitch by his description of the game to be found in the British provinces.

I met an hunter with him, he said, and he would have the first ranging out in the woods. His father would be delighted to see me, he said, they would, of course, he had doubtless got to them, and even afterwards he showed me a letter which both his parents expressed a desire to see the new friend, who could be introduced, they said, without the least inconvenience, for as long a time as he might wish to stay. So late I was in New Brunswick, away up the St. Lawrence River, in the very heart of the great north, and my reception by the family of my young friend had been all that I could have wished.

Bob's parents were really Scotch people, very intelligent and very kind. "Mr. Campbell," said a thousand words of kind, well chosen with words and always right the one had an air of independence and plenty that was very pleasing.

"Now Isabel, whose name I had already learned to pronounce to the L; it is difficult, you see, a remarkable piece of good fortune, full of merit, and very much to be proud of."

A RACE FOR LIFE.

By HENRY M. HAMILTON.

THE cinnamon bear is the most formidable of all the wild animals of the North American continent. He belongs to the family of grizzly bears, but is found only in the Northwestern and Pacific States, not ranging so far north as his brother, the black grizzly. Some years ago I had an encounter with cinnamon grizzlies which I was not likely to forget, as I bear a vivid remembrance of it about with me in the shape of a scar on my right arm, just below the shoulder.

At that time I was about seventeen, and lived with my father at Grand Gulch, a small settlement among the Coconino Mountains, about fifty miles, in a straight line, west of Denver. My mother was dead, and I was left a good deal, perhaps too much, to my own devices.

Though not an idle or undisciplined boy, I was not very busy at school, and preferred to spend my time in working or hunting, rather than in studying the Latin grammar or declension tables. Many a time I have shouldered a pick, and gone off to work in the mines along with the men—for Grand Gulch was a mining community; and they said, that I did as good a day's work as

A WOOD TERROR.

By CAPTAIN R. M. HARTFORD.

I find it a good many years ago that two families lived in the Mohawk Valley, named respectively Deane and Carter. They were among the pioneers of that section, having settled there when the danger from the red Indians was greater than that from the wild beasts, numerous as were the latter. They met with many stirring experiences, and a number from each of the families fell a victim to the savage's hands. But the peril from that source gradually lessened until it may be said to have vanished altogether.

These pioneers, but tough and intrepid they. Generously blessed with large families, it was hard work to win the needed sustenance from the soil. But they were not afraid of labor, and their hands were true, and therefore easily satisfied.

The long ridges of the two families, of which I am writing, were separated by almost a mile of wilderness, the nearest settlement being three times as far in the backwoods. The

BEAR AND FORBEAR.

By HOLLIS FERRISS, JR.

ON a certain afternoon, early last autumn, Bob Harris and his brother Jim were the most disgusted individuals within a radius of a score of miles of the spot where they sat on a fallen tree, growling over the bad luck that had befallen them all day.

They had been hunting since early morning in the forests of Arkansas, spurred on by the certainty that they would soon be engaged in a close, and they hadn't as much as a hair or feather to show for all the powder burnt. It was worse even than that, as I will show you.

Bob was eighteen, and his brother sixteen years old. Like every one in their section of the country, they were accustomed to the use of firearms almost from their infancy. They had started out, as I have said, early in the morning, some of bringing down wild and tame. The boys were known to be quite plentiful in that locality. They took with them three valuable leopards (leopard-hounds), who struck a trail within a half hour after entering the mountainous wilderness which extended far up into the Ozark region of Missouri. They knew, or at least thought they knew, from his peculiar yelping, that he had found a "fox," and they

SOMEONE says, "I've always felt up on my feet, but now I feel down on my feet!" This expression was a recent, long-term finding of a study of stress, a field that represents of fun and good nature. The dispute were not of fashionable cut, and it would require a vigorous stretch of the imagination to call him a dandy. The costume he wore, an old-fashioned frock coat, a pair of breeches and a top hat, was descending the steps of the Ashes Hotel. The hat was almost crushed, and gave a look of impatience, as if he planned a high estimate upon himself.

AN ELEPHANT IN THE HAYFIELD.

By GEORGE B. COCKER.

I HAVE many pleasant recollections of the small New England farms which was the home of my boyhood. As I think of it there come back memories of the various seasons and the scenes belonging to them.

There was the strong beautiful winter, with its skating, and hockey, and sleighing; next, the spring, when the plow was turning the cold soil, and the after day the robins grew brighter in the pasture lands; then, the glowing summer, with its scene of mowing corn and grass; and finally the fruitful autumn, when the orchards were loaded with red and yellow apples, and the gardens with melons.

I hardly know which period I liked best, since each had so many attractions for me.

Yet when we look back upon his youth, some incident happening at a given season of the year is apt to give that season a prominence in his recollection; and so my backward glance at our old farm calls up the summer, with its hayrack and its twittering barn swallows, more distinctly than any other picture, because it was there that an incident occurred which left with me an impression that is still vivid as I write.

THE HAYRACK WAS STILLED BY THE HANDS OF THE MEN, AND THE LIGHTS WERE BURNING AT THE END OF THE ROAD WHEN THE ELEPHANT, WHICH HAD BEEN BARNED TO STAY IN THE STABLE AND TRUCK.

Tom Parcher's First and Last Buffalo Hunt.

By FRANK H. CONVERSE.

A COUNTRYMAN to reliable authority, there was not now left a human hand of buffalo throughout the entire West—our country, as great has been their extermination during the past few years. When Tom Parcher, and others, returned—not school—to be sent out to the north and the south in western Kansas, that he might become a full-blown hunter, there were many, quite a good many more, in all probability. Tom, being an only son who, if not exactly spoiled, was, if I may so express it, a little spoiled with self-sufficiency through having had his own way for about eleven years, of course gained his point. He was sent according to demand, and I am not sure that, with all their money, Mr. and Mrs. Parcher did not experience a disagreeable feeling of relief at his departure. A disagreeable boy in the household, and one who stands in the way more than "Apples in the Encyclopedia," goes to be a trial no matter how good he may be or how many fine qualities he may possess. Tom was a combination of all these.

WITH THE EXHIBITS OF SHARPS, TOM HAD MADE A CONSIDERABLE SUM AT THE BISHOP'S EYE WHEN A GROUP DEPARTED THE CHASE, AND THE BULL, FROM BEING IN THE PATH.

COMANCHE AND HIS RIDER.

By L. B. GOODWIN.

AS a small party near the edge of a forest of oaks and wildcats were ranged two groups of men, who appeared to be waiting for something. They kept at first as motionless, only throwing nervous glances at each other, and the glorious spring sunlight, which had brought the richest of wild flowers and lupines into bloom, could not dispel their mutual suspicion.

The loud neighing of a horse was answered by others that were hoarse just out of sight in the shade. The horse seemed to be more visible than the men.

When they had brought to this rendezvous. Perhaps the latter felt rebuffed, for with that thinking of almost one of the groups began uttering the cry of speech.

"Must be mighty hard on her the leap," interrogatively remarked a man in a deer-skin suit. At the same time he returned to his belt a hatchet with which he had been cleaving a path through the dense undergrowth.

"Wants a quarter of," said the person addressed, glancing fleetly at an elegant timekeeper which was exhibited on his palm, as if challenging the moonday sun to

By F. J. MURPHY.

BENNY called very respectfully to my attention, and during long after the last rain had left for the city, I determined to seek the pleasant surroundings of Mr. Henshaw's garden, where I had passed a month the previous season, and ask him to keep me for the night. Just as I was opening Mr. Henshaw's front gate, I saw a young lady walking down the garden path. Her distinctive size and dress of recent years reminded me in-distinctly of "Jenny Wren."

I held open the gate for her to pass through, and received a bright smile and a glance from a beautiful pair of dark eyes.

Wondering who she could be, I passed up the path and knocked on the door.

I was welcomed with surprise and delight by "aunt Henshaw" and "aunt Polly," as they were familiarly known.

While partaking of the beautiful repast which aunt Polly had laid upon the table for me, I found opportunity to inquire who was the young lady I had met at the gate.

"Oh, that's Miss Henshaw," said aunt Henshaw.

COALS OF FIRE.

By JOHN H. WHITEHEAD.

CRISP, reddish brown, reddish gray, still rugged and unsmooth—stretching of dense chaparral, and ranges of rugged mountains; over all, a honey comb.

A dusty trail, which seemed constantly bent on tying itself into a hopeless tangle of knots and loops, wound its shallow length around unimpaired desolation and across the great divide.

Down this trail, swathed in the dust-storm which their feet had raised, a long file of heavily-laden horses picked their slow way, urged on by Mexican drivers, with a fusillade of Spanish epithets and the English.

Here to face with these, armed in arms of such, came a shaggy young fellow of uncertain, with a little dog trotting at his heels. He was clad in loose clothes, had a short cut in his hair, and a wide-brimmed hat, and a wide-brimmed hat, and a wide-brimmed hat.

In sight of him, the foremost horse, swathed in a Spanish "barba" that swayed far-off colors and brought down on his head the undulating line of the drivers. The youth laughed lightly and nodded.

WITH BULWARK HEAD-POUNTING, BUILT THINLY, HIS ARM BETWEEN HIS BRISTLY POINT OF NOSE AND THE TRAIL, WITH HIS WHITE SHIRT TIED AROUND HIS WAIST, HE WAS CLIMBING FROM THE CLIFF'S EDGE.

A STRANGE CRAFT.

By GEOFFREY RANDOLPH.

MY young friends Jim and Joe Allison are emphatic in declaring that they will never, never forget their adventure in Florida last summer. When you come to learn the particulars, I am sure you will take the same view of it that they do. Jim and Joe are brothers, the first sixteen and the second fourteen years old. Last autumn they came to the North to attend school, and perhaps some of the members of the Alumni have made their acquaintance. If so, you will agree with me that they are bright, manly fellows, who, if their lives are spared, will become useful and popular citizens.

The father of the Allison boys was an officer of the Confederacy. With the wreck of a once handsome fortune, he went back to his old home in Florida, after the close of the war. He was still a young man, and had been fortunate enough to go through the whole "campaign" without a scratch. He married an amiable lady from the North, who, in addition to her many fine qualities, had the not objectionable one of considerable wealth. So in

CHAPTER I.

A STORY OF THE FUTURE.

"I am about to relate to you a story which is very strange, and the fact that it is so is proved by the fact that it is so." — Jack Marvin.

Jack Marvin was one of the greatest railway engineers of the country. He ran the first engine over the whole length of his road in Illinois, and for twenty years held the rank of First Class, the master of the Through Express, which was the last run in the westward of the country company for whom he worked so faithfully.

It was one of his best and most successful runs, and it was more than one accident he displayed a confidence, quickness of thought and real sense of responsibility that would appall any engineer. Let me illustrate.

THERE COULD BE NO DOUBT ABOUT IT: WHEN CLIFFORD'S (SECOND), BARRY AND, WAS SHOWN OVER WITH HIS WEAPON, HEARD DEFENSIVE.

WAS HE A HERO?

JIM INGALLS'S ADVENTURES ON THE NIGHT BEFORE THE FOURTH.

By G. JEFFREY.

It was not the voice of duty calling which roused Jim Ingalls from his slumber, his bed at midnight.

No stern messenger showed him out of the back window, and compelled him to punt his and back in that dangerous slide down the steep slope of the dead road.

Indeed, had he been so minded, he might have walked boldly out of the front door and demanded to be taken, for Uncle Seth and aunt, Betty were the soundest of sleepers and the hardest of wakers.

On such a night, however, Jim and his friends disdained all ordinary methods, and stole silently and secretly from their homes.

After scuffling through the back yard and skulking round several pastures, keeping up all the time the pleasing fiction of pursuit, Jim at last reached the little room, just behind George Evans's yellow barn, finding, to his inexpressible disgust, that he was the last one of a dozen boys who had appointed that place as midnight rendezvous.

An enthusiastic indignation meeting was in progress.

"It is a shame and a disgrace," Walter Pitman was saying. "George Evans is at the bottom and the top of it all."

"The idea of it!" cried Jim Faxon. "I wonder if our neighbors and our townsmen would have it as they did if they had known what their secretaries were a-coming to!"

That speech told, and for the moment Jim was looked up to with respect.

"The church bells are to be rung at nine-rice," said Walter Pitman; "meanwhile, their tongues are hidden for fear that our boys might make a disturbance during the night. It is in the will of the company, I will hide them over again, and the bells shall not ring at all."

A fierce cheer, quickly suppressed, attended the signified approval of all present.

The perfect justice of the plan commended itself equally to their judgment and to their inclination.

TOM GALE, a boy who was with me when I was sent to the ship Warren, was a colored chimney. I think that when he was busy on shipboard, the people of his neighborhood would have considered a scene of relief.

It is quite probable, however, that they predicted his speedy return. They could hardly have believed that he would remain with the ship during the entire voyage of three years. But, I am quite sure that they must have expected him to die, and that his inward-bound vessel that he could go on board of.

BY J. H. LORSTON.

IT was in the orchard, under the shade of the trees, Harry Stevenson and his partner, John Edwards, were sitting upon the grass, discussing a subject of great importance to their little home. "I tell you, Jack, it is an awfully bad thing," said Harry, with an earnest expression on his young face. "Mother said so this morning, and she looked so thoughtful when she said it. It is a shame, isn't it?" "Yes, but what is it?" "It is the matter of the dog in all this world, and I would not be very much surprised to hear him speak of any day."

The boys raised themselves to a sitting posture as Harry began speaking, and looked at each other with a look of interest before them. The dog, as Harry called it, was a small, dark-colored animal, and the expression in his brown eyes seemed almost human as he returned their glance, as if he were of their own kind. "It is a shame, Harry," continued Jack, his voice rising with indignation. "I think it is not much to put mother, she—"

CHAPTER I.
THE FOOTBALL OF FORTUNE.

"The speaker was a big, raw, red-headed fellow, with a face as red as a beet, and a voice as loud as a steam engine. He was dressed in a suit of black, and in one hand carried a good sized, smooth, white ball, which he held up under his arm."

He had entered the city at the last minute before the first of the city, and consequently found nearly all the seats occupied. The person to whom the question was addressed was also a big, but one of rather good manners, for before replying he favored the speaker with a prolonged stare, from which he withdrew:

FARMER BRENT'S BOY.

By F. C. FOSBETT.

"Well, I think things are coming to a pretty pass when Bill Spiner gets to be the head of our class," said Howard Dunsley, a studious looking boy of sixteen, to a group of his classmates, one afternoon just after the Middletown public school had dismissed for the day. "It's not enough," he continued, with an air of dignity, "to have to go to the same school with a school boy, and an absolute foundling at that, without having him at the head of one's class."

"I don't know what you're going to do about it, Howard," remarked Bob Gilman, the very head of the class, as he nonchalantly tossed a ball up with his right hand and deftly caught it behind his back with his left; "Spiner cut me down, but, and here likely to tumble head first into the bottom of the term, for the student body and he really is bright." And ever good natured Bob kept on twisting his ball in the air, the joy of his leadership in the class evidently not bothering his head in any great extent.

"Yes," returned Howard, "if your head hadn't been so full of base ball, you'd know here and the Flying Fathers were the true owners of Virginia."

AN ADVENTURE IN THE AIR,

BY GEORGE E. WALSH.

"THE day will come, I think, when a ride through the air will be as ordinary an occurrence as a sail on the water," said my friend, an experienced aviator, as he threw a heavy coil of rope out of the floating car, and let the van bag of silk shoot higher up among the clouds.

We were about a thousand feet above the surface of the earth, and everything below us seemed blurred and indistinct. The land, which had no shape or form about it, but looked like a huge canvas, blotched and speckled over with dots of particular points. The clouds were the only things that appeared distinct, and no cloud was so far from them that they appeared as one every side with a mass of dimly-tinted vapors.

The professor watched the actions of the balloon with close attention, making the large canvas obey his slightest wish, as if it was alive and endowed with intelligence.

After the first peculiar sensation of floating lightly in the air had passed away, I began to enter into conversation with my solitary companion about his adventures and experiences in a balloon. He was a man whose practical suggestions were

AS Van gazed in amazement at the strange marks upon the breast of the native, a sentence from his uncle's letter, which by this time he knew nearly by heart, occurred to his mind.

"Good Heaven!" he gasped; "it isn't possible—that you are Robert Martin?"

"No, I was christened, but I'm no taken back as hardly to be sure who I am," was the dumb reply. "But you, your name is Martin?"

"Read this," briefly interrupted Van, who could hardly believe the credence of his eyes and ears. As he thus spoke he extended his uncle's letter, which Martin

CHAPTER I.

WALTER GRIFFITH.

A BOY of fifteen, with a heady breeze upon his face, walked down Fulton Street, in Brooklyn, with a small bundle of clothes tied up in a red silk handkerchief. He looked about him with a curious eye, for he had never before been in a city. He was very much impressed by the large and showy stores which line this—the chief business street of New York's sister city.

"I wonder if New York is any bigger than Brooklyn," he said, almost unconsciously giving utterance to the thought.

"Well, I should smile if it was," responded another voice.

Turning his head, Walter Griffith's eyes fell upon a boy dressed in a blue uniform.

THE SIGN OF THE CROSS.

THE night was clear, with a full moon in the sky. Looking out from the back fence, the earliest objects were visible in the clearing, and it would have been as impossible for an Indian scout to stand up to the watchmen without detection as to do so at midday.

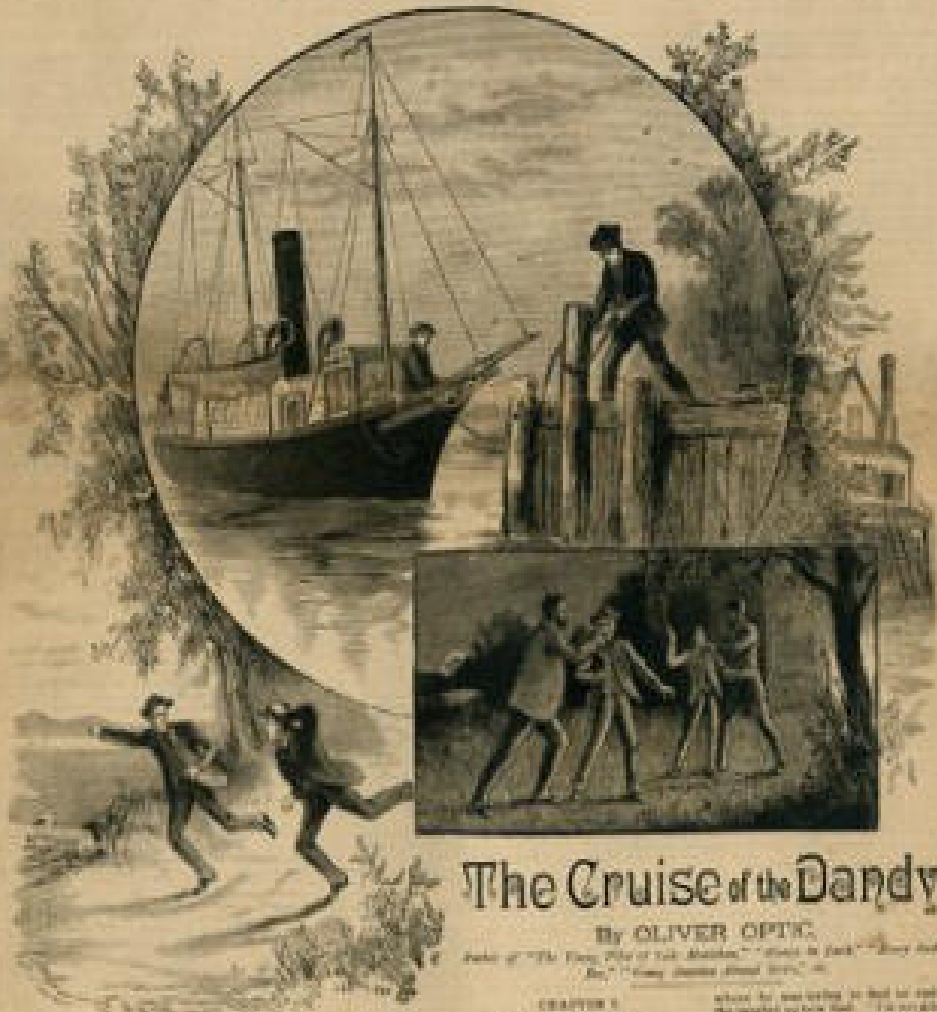

Now, in view of these circumstances, was Colonel Nick Hurley to get twenty men from within the fort into the deep shadow of the woods, unobserved by the vigilant Indians and Tories? The incident of the two messengers could not have failed to arouse the suspicion of Kit Wilson and the Indians, and they were certain, as I have said, to be seriously watched.

THE evening was a memorable one for Fred. His enjoyment had been far greater than he anticipated; and what a boy of sixteen will not anticipate is not worth considering. It seemed to him as he left Charlie Bussard's with a good crop and a big income that he had been that even the old, clay question for nothing, but, in fact, had he in this time presented no friend save the single one whose arm had saved him, within the week, he would have been fully satisfied. A MEETING AT THE SPRING.

By FRANK H. CONVERSE.

THE word "tenderfoot," as applied to the Westerner by the newly arrived delegate from the East, was not originally used as a term of reproach. The newcomer as a general thing took himself simply about a day or two of tramping over the hot, sunbaked ground, or the heavy silt of the plain. And until the soles of his gaiter straps got hardened a bit, he is literally tenderfooted.

There was not much danger that Lew Craig would ever become the spoken, either in its reproachful or its literal sense. He was one of those peculiar cases where a young fellow comes to the expectedly dark into a calling for which he is peculiarly adapted.

Charles Craig, his older and only brother, and Lew were orphans. Mr. Craig specialized in books while Charles was in college and Lew living thereafter.

A SCENE AND A DIALOGUE.

"HOW do you do, Mr. Brown? Don't you know me? Warren Haviland, sir. Surely you haven't forgotten me?" and a tall, handsome boy of sixteen, in a neat traveling suit, and laden with valise and underclothes, offered his hand to a middle-aged gentleman, who was evidently too much struck by his soldierly appearance to find speech.

They stood in the warehouse of the imported dry goods firm of Haviland, Roe & Company, of New York, a wholesale establishment of well known wealth and gravity. Mr. Roe was the partner, and Warren Haviland was the son of the CHAPTER IV. A LONG CHASE.

AT THE discovery of Hawk's treachery, Warren tried another door in the room. It led him into a sort of closet lined up with book shelves; the door had a long narrow window which opened on the side of the house, and by pressing his face flat against the glass he could see a saddled horse standing on the grass. Mr. Hawk was holding the bridle and beckoning imperatively to some unseen person.

"What does this mean?" thought Warren. "It's treachery, anyhow, and I won't let him off with it if I have to smash the glass." He ran to the front window, for the man in the closet was too nervous to permit his eyes to be seen. He found the sack stuck fast. He tore out the screen and discovered that the window was nailed down with two long nails, he got the pick, and, moved by rage, scratched out the nails in half a minute, clung up the sack, and leaped through to the ground. The clasp of iron bolts snared his ears as he alighted. He dashed around the corner of the house, leaped over a paling, and came face to face with Mr. Hawk, who was staring after the retreating horseman with an anxious grin.

"Tom! Cousin Tom! I thought Tom in his desperation, as he sped after the rider across a plowed field.

But the rider never looked round; increasing the pace of his horse to a flying run, he left Warren far behind, reached the pale house, horse and rider rose lightly in the air and sailed over it, and vanished. Warren stood still, wondering with rage, and almost suffocating from loss of breath and disappointment.

"That was Tom, I'm quite sure it was," he said himself. "A slim, pale boy, with light, close cropped hair; I wish I had seen his face!" Hawk had been running after him, shrieking out remonstrances which he had not listened to. He came up, now, panting and pulling a long face of concern, in which his little eyes sparkled with malicious glee.

"Why have you sent my cousin away?" demanded Warren, without concealing his indignation.

Calb Hawk continued to pant speechlessly till Warren repeated his question at full force, when he made a start to gasp out—"Don't! I tell you that's not your cousin! How could it be Tom?"

"Not my cousin?" retorted Warren in amazement; "who was he, then?"

"If you had condescended to ask that at first, you wouldn't have had such a wild goose chase," sneered Hawk. "That was Glib West, a neighbor's boy, who told me

THESE of my young readers who have seen a full grown live bull-dog are generally all the time in a museum, or even have good ideas of the animal from the many pictures seen of them, it will be easy for me to give a bold and pretty effective description of the Arctic musk ox, for the two look much alike.

The musk ox is about two-thirds the size of the bull-dog, but as he has hair TWO or three times as long, reaching almost down to his feet, he looks nearly as big. The horns of the musk ox, instead of sticking out like those of a

 THE BIG BEAR OF BEAR.

ONCE in October several years ago, Big Beaver and I were out looking for game, in the Powder River country of Montana. Big Beaver was a Crow Indian, an old and skillful hunter, and white at heart, though his skin was copper colored. I was at that time employed at the Powder River Agency, to provide game for the mess table of the detachment stationed there.

Big Beaver and I, mounted on our horses, were leisurely making our way along the right bank of the river, which was pretty thickly grown with shrubs and bushes, with here and there a clump of tall pines, when we caught sight of a big bear on the other side of the stream. He was a grizzly, of the variety known as the silver tip bear. He was standing on his hind legs, digging the roots out of a hollow tree. This is a favorite pastime of bears, and particularly brown bears and silver tips, who, have a keen partiality for the big, fat larch grobs that make their home in the decayed wood.

The bear was so absorbed in his pastime

This was the reply made by Miss Hope Everton.

One might have looked the whole city of New York over without finding a more beautiful maiden of sixteen. She was pretty, though not elegantly dressed. Her form was simply perfect. The Prairie Horses;

BY HENRY M. HAMILTON.

THE PRINCIPLE OF OUR HORSES HAS ALREADY BEEN GIVEN IN THE JOURNAL, DRAWN BY THE HORSE, AND THAT IS NOT NEARLY TO SETTLE THE QUESTION OF COMPROMISE.

ABOUT thirty years ago I was for some time with a Government surveying party in New Mexico. We had been directed to map out a section of the great stretch of country ceded to the United States by Mexico not long before, and to do upon the most suitable location for a frontier post.

The tract which we had to survey was for the most part a rich, rolling prairie, lying between two tributaries of the Rio Grande, and watered by many smaller streams. It was in those days a land full of dangers, for it was a favorite stamping ground for those enemies of the Southwest, the Apache Indians.

●A BATTLE IN THE SNOWS;●

THE STORY OF A FRENCH CANADIAN.

BY FRANK M. CONVERSE.

"O, ah—I am of the French Canadian. My mother was of Nova Scotia—this is why I speak your language as I do. But you comprehend our world? You? Then I will tell you of the star here on my neck of which you ask."

It is to you of America, a dreary country—this Canada of ours. But we find much of enjoyment in it even through the winters in long and icy. There are the solaces and the weddings—and sledges ride like those of Russia almost. Some of our people have dogs from our neighbors of Labrador which they harness to the sledge and go flying over the crust as in England. But not for me the dog team. There is too much of the whip. It has made my blood to be hot, as I have seen the dumb brutes cry and wringe under the lash and even the howl of the brute of two legs who drives.

Ah, no! The small horses of Canada—remarkable, they call them—of swiftness and strength enough for impetuous. And it was with such that I went the autumn of which I have to tell.

His name was Bijou, for to me he was a jewel. He came one day as a young colt in our stable—wherever, I never discovered—and so I rear him for my own. As he grew strong and large I built for him a sledge of skin to carry two with stores for hunting in wolf.

For in the winter Jean Baptiste of Pre-vance and I are hunters and trappers through the territory of the Northwest. Our poles we sell to the Company of Hudson Bay. Skins of the deer and bear—the beaver, with now and then an otter or silver-gray fox, for these through much hunting are scarce enough now. It is a wild life, with much of peril and hardship.

One must endure the cold as an Esquimaux, and possess with the patience the craft of the Indian to be a hunter of success in the northern wilds.

Jean Baptiste was my brother. We never quarrel, that I recollect, in our life till this time of which I shall tell.

We were bound for the valley of the Wasatch—it is now four years St. Martin's day. The winter was of severity unexampled, and we had hesitancy to go so far, but it was of necessity. There is the old mother and Pierre, who is blind, in the house, and Marie my wife with the child of tender years so care for. And oh, moreover, we are very poor.

Jean and I went to camp near the head waters of Big River, without the year before we had success. It was in the gray of afternoon, and Bijou had done forty miles since the sunrise. The sledge, with two full grown men, our stores, and two guns, was a hard pull for so long a day's journey, and within ten miles of camp Bijou gave down at speed.

For a long time, people have been using the Internet to find information. But now, they are using it to do much more than just find information. They are using it to buy things, to talk to friends, to watch movies, and to do many other things. The Internet has become an important part of our lives, and it is only getting more important as time goes on.

CHAPTER I.

THE ATTACK ON THE TRAIN IN THE MOUNTAINS.

HE was, passing through a defile in one of the wildest and most mountainous sections of the far West, suddenly came to a full stop.

When the locomotive had slowed down to pass a point of possible danger, two fierce looking men leaped into the cab, overpowered the fireman and engineer, and brought the train to a standstill.

At the same moment, two ruffians boarded each of the three cars.

"Hold up your hands, every one!" shouted one of them, as he presented himself at the forward door of the sleeper next to the baggage car.

The passengers seemed to be paralyzed by the sudden and unexpected attack, and they all obeyed the peremptory order. At any rate, all of them seemed to do so, though a little later there appeared to be at least one exception to the general compliance.

Some of the passengers were seated in the sleeper as far as the forward end, and others to the rear, as one half of the seats were turned in the latter direction.

In the third section from the rear were seated two boys, one of fifteen, and the other of sixteen years of age, who had come all the way from Omaha on the train, and from New York a few days earlier.

"We have struck a snag, and there may be shooting here, Harold," said the one who was facing the engine.

"Drop down on the floor, Val!" said Harold in a low and determined tone, as he did so himself.

His companion followed the direction given him, and they both fell upon their knees, with their arms on the seat facing to the rear. One of the two ruffians at the other end of the car saw the action, and thought it meant that the boys intended to resist them, and possibly to fire upon the robbers from their place of concealment behind the seats.

"Get around to the other end of the car, Soggy!" said he, as he shoved his confederate out of the door that led to the wash room, and followed him himself.

It appeared to be the robber's intention to retire for a moment until he had, as he called the other, could enter the car at the further end, where the two ruffians would command the whole of it, and resistance would be impossible.

"Now is our time, Val!" said Harold, as soon as the two outlaws had disappeared through the door.

At the same moment he took his valise from the floor, and rushed to the rear of the car.

Val followed the example of his companion, securing his valise, which was the counterpart of the one carried by Harold. The latter halted on the platform of the car, and took a look about.

"He is coming on this side, and we will jump off on the other," said he, leaving the action to the winds.

Before Soggy could reach the rear steps of the sleeper, the two boys had disappeared behind the rocks which flanked the track on both sides.

Soggy made all haste to get into the car, and to commence operations upon the passengers. Not one of them appeared to have the least disposition to attempt any resistance, and hardly one had lowered his hands in the short absence of the assistants.

Pocket books, watches, jewelry, and weapons were taken from the passengers without the least ploy or menace, though some of them pleaded poverty, and begged that a portion of their money might be left to them.

The two outlaws who had taken possession of the baggage and express car were rummaging out trunks at the side door; and they even compelled the messenger and the baggage master to assist them in ridding out the safe. The steel strong box was pushed out at the side of the car, on the top of the mass of trunks and valises that had accumulated near the door, smashing in wooden boxes as though they had been made of pasteboard.

Captain Chaffler, the leader of the gang, who had attacked the forward sleeper, had finished his work before either of the other cars was rifled. He then entered the one in which Soggy and his companion had been stationed.

At the moment when he came into the car, these two worthies were searching an elderly man, dressed in very common clothes, who apparently was not inclined to hand over the contents of his pockets.

At his feet was a small traveling bag, which he was trying to force under the seat he occupied, but which the steam pipes prevented him from hiding.

"Have you found him, Soggy?" asked Captain Chaffler, of Soggy's companion, as he came to the point where the two robbers were operating upon the man.

"I have not seen any one that answered to the description," replied the man called Soggy, turning to the leader of the band.

"He is not on the forward sleeper, and he must be in this one," continued the captain.

"He may be here, but I have not spotted him yet. This old fellow is the only one that gives us any trouble."

Captain Chaffler looked at the subject of Soggy's remark, passing the other robber in order to obtain a better view of his face and form. The passenger was still kicking the small bag at his feet, and try-

CHAPTER VI.

AN UNFORTUNATE DISAGREEMENT.

PERHAPS Harold's conclusion that the great cave was the outlaw's home appeared a rather hasty one to his companion Val. It was not a sudden thought, however, for his reasoning had suggested the idea to him before. The robbers were the only human beings that had been seen in this region, and it was natural to attribute to them the existence of the boat and the lantern.

The robbery had taken place about half way between two stations forty miles apart, and they had seen no signs of a human habitation anywhere in the vicinity of the spot. Between the delta through which the railroad passed and the mighty canyon there was almost an impenetrable hill, over which the fugitives from the train had passed with infinite trouble and labor.

Harold was satisfied that he was right in his conclusion, for the simple reason that the outlaws were the only persons who had been seen in this locality, and probably they had some hidden way between the canyon and the railroad track than that chosen by the fugitives.

"I guess you must be right, Harold," said Val, when he had in some measure recovered from the astonishment and dread which the announcement of his companion had produced in his mind.

"I feel perfectly sure of it. This boat is big enough to hold the whole of them; and one or two persons would not have taken the trouble to build a craft as large as this."

"How many of them do you think there are, Harold?" asked Val, who had lost some of the lightness of his tone and manner.

"I could not count them, but I should think there were seven or eight at them," replied Harold, as he entered the lantern to the place where he had found it.

"I don't believe there is more than one thing for us to do under present circumstances," suggested Val. "That is to make tracks for the railroad. We can stay there till a train comes along, or we can fast it to the station where we stopped to breakfast."

"Twenty miles after we get to the track; and the outlaws are likely to remain there all night," said Harold.

"But we must make the track farther to the west than the place where they are."

"It was hard to impossible for us to get over here the way we came; and we don't know any better way to reach the railroad. Besides, we must take Mr. Winwood with us," replied Harold.

"I don't see why we should break our necks for him," protested Val, with more energy than he had displayed before. "He is nothing to us; and he is the biggest nuisance that ever went about on two legs."

"No matter what else he is; he is a human being, and we can not desert him in such a region as this, for the robbers might find him; or if they did not, he would starve to death, for he is as helpless as a baby."

"I don't care a rotten apple for him. He has been trying to sponge us out of a few cents at a time ever since we left New York," sneered Val, and his nose and mouth emphasized his disgust. "I am not going to risk my head for him."

"I don't like him any better than you do, but I will not be one to leave him to perish of hunger, or to be tortured by the ruffians. We need not say anything more about that matter. He shall not be deserted," said Harold, very decidedly.

"I thought I was one of this gang of two, and I suppose my will is as good as yours," growled Val.

"In all reasonable things, you shall be heard and heeded; but when it comes to following an old man over to famine and death, I will have no hand in it."

"But I am not going to do anything more for old Winwood."

"All right, Val; you are your own master, and you can do what you please. If we must divide here, you may go your way, and I will go mine," replied Harold, as he directed his gaze to the interior of the gorge.

He tried to penetrate the gloom of the cavern, but a wall of darkness obstructed his vision at so great distance in front of him. He was annoyed by the proposition of his companion to abandon the old man and escape as best they could from the canyon; but he was firm in his intention not to be guilty of any such treason and infamy.

From the dismal view within the cavern, he turned to the open sky; and he seemed to be engaged in reasoning over the problem of the cavern rather than considering the obstinacy of his companion. He said nothing to indicate to Val what he was thinking about.

Harold seemed to have reached a conclusion of some kind, for leaving his place at one end of the score, he went to the other. Picking up a pole, of which there were four in the boat, as well as two paddles, he thrust in down to the bottom of the stream, which appeared to be not more than from four to six feet deep in any place.

Shoving the craft back into the bushes that guarded the entrance of the gorge, he cut off the line by which he had secured it. The current was not swift enough to defeat his efforts, and he continued to pole the boat back till it had reached from the bushes into the open river.

"What are you going to do, Harold?" asked Val, who had expected some of the ill nature which had possessed him, though he was generally pleasant in his manner.

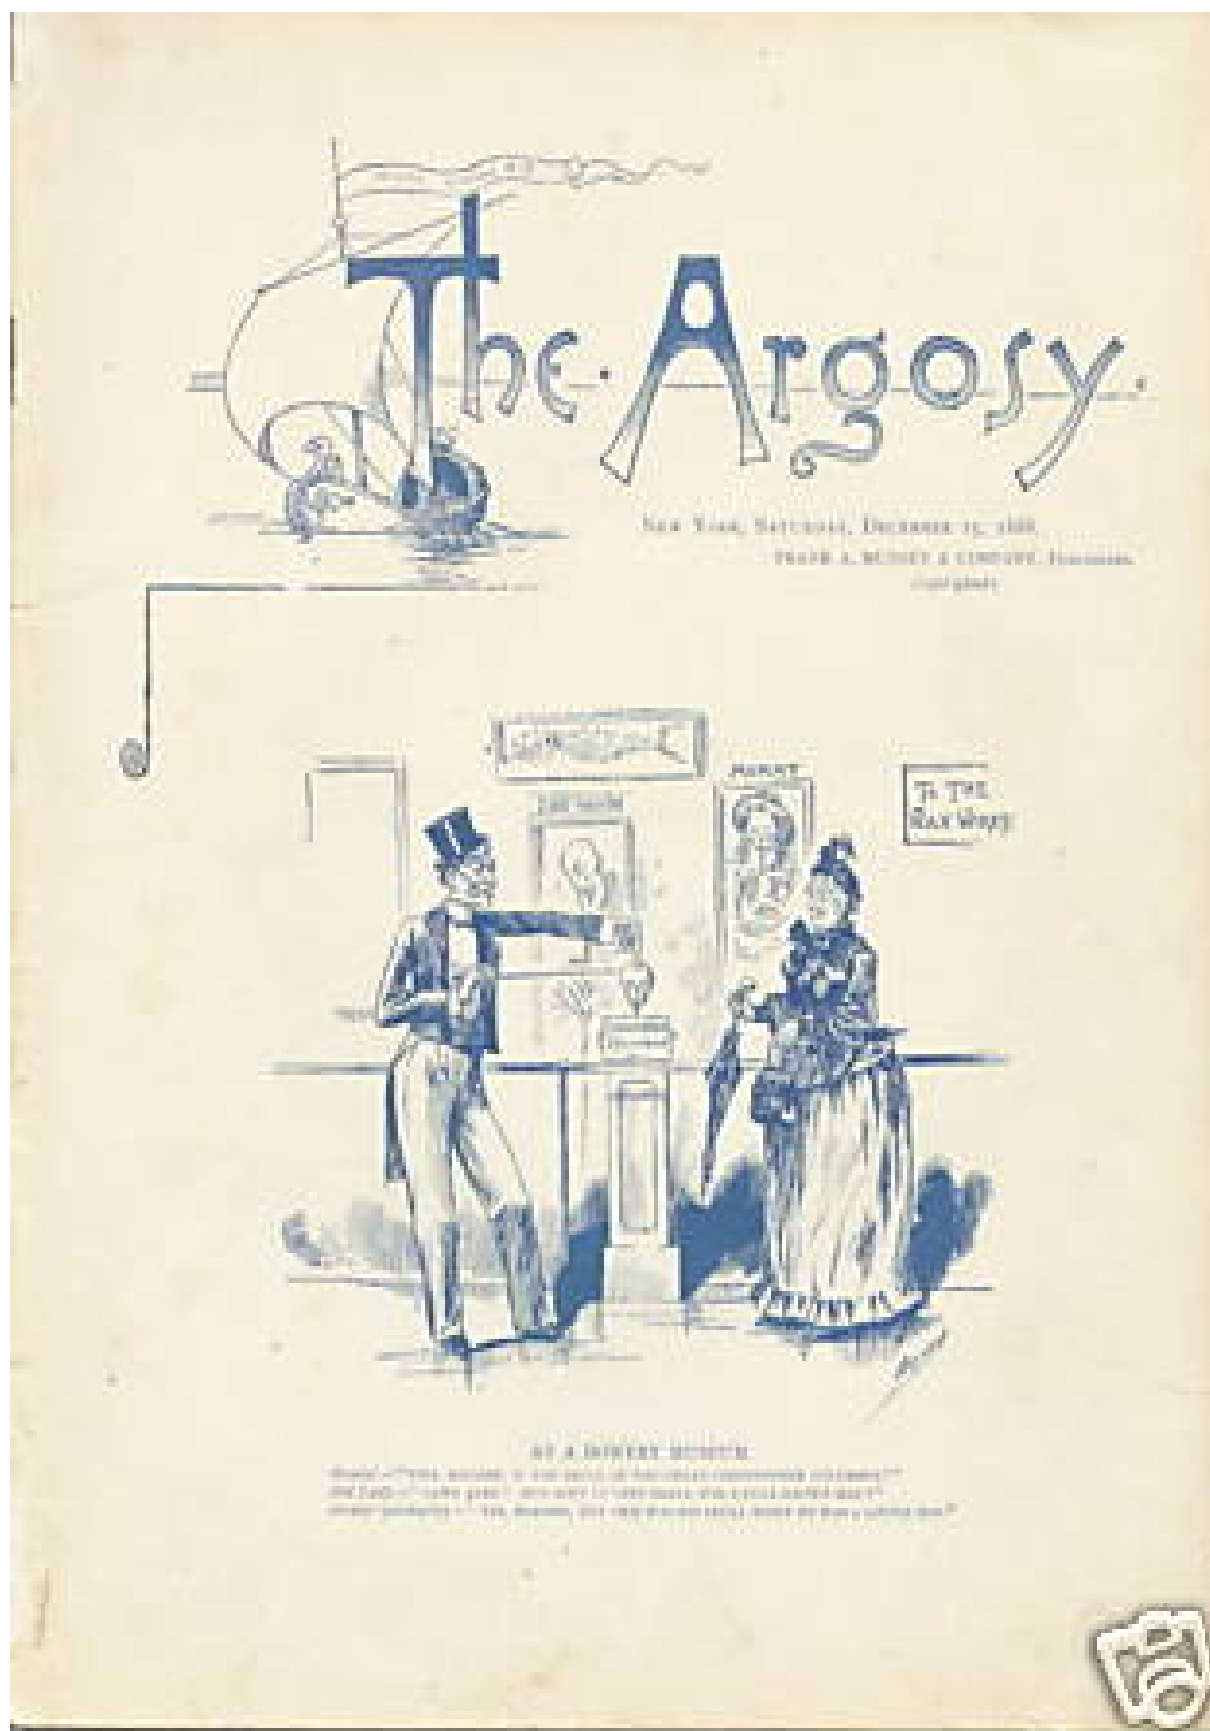

"I am going back to the place where we left Mr. Winwood," replied the leader.

Harold shoved the scow over to the shore of the river where the current was the least; but it was hard work to move the clumsy craft, and the perspiration rolled from his brow.

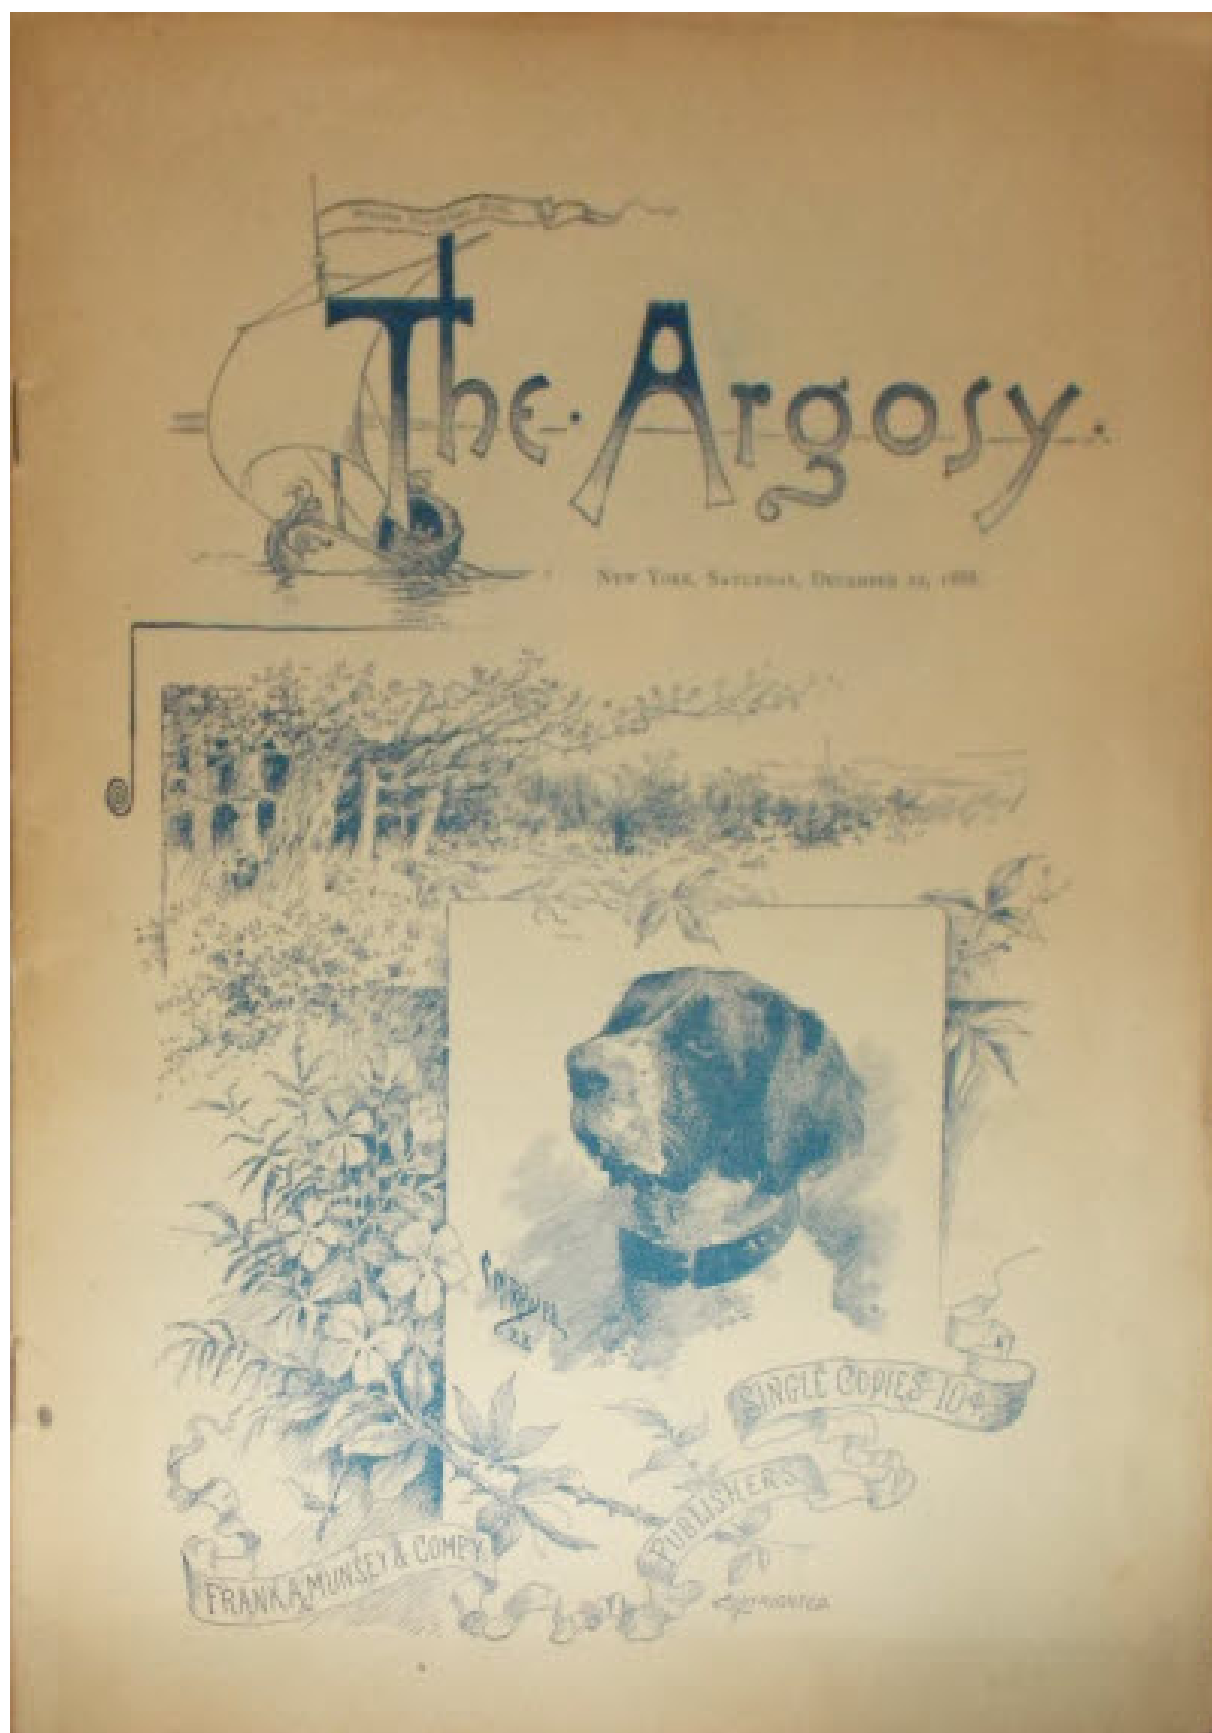

"I am willing to help you, Harold," said Val, when he saw what a hard time his friend was having. "If you are going to the place where we left the old man, I am going there too."

Val took one of the poles and went to work with it. Though the

CHAPTER V.

UNCLE JACOB REVIVES HIS WALKING PAPERS.

SQUIRE MARLOWE returned to the breakfast room, wearing rather an embarrassed expression. Percy had followed his mother, and the old man found himself for a short time alone. There was a twinkle of amusement in his eyes, which vanished on the reappearance of his nephew.

"I am sorry to have left you alone, Uncle Jacob," said the squire, civilly.

"Oh, don't treat me with any ceremony, Albert. Being as we are such near relations, we ought to be free and easy like."

"I am glad to hear you say so, for I shall be obliged to treat you unceremoniously."

"Oh!" said Uncle Jacob, inquiringly.

"I regret to say that my wife, who is of a very delicate organization, is taken suddenly ill, and I am afraid I shall have to ask you to cut your visit short, and come again some other time."

"I'm surprised to hear that, Albert. I thought Mrs. Marlowe looked in excellent health."

"You can't always tell by outward appearances. She is subject to severe headaches, and in that condition can't bear the least noise or excitement. That is why I can't invite you to stay any longer."

"I understand," said Uncle Jacob, with—it might have been—a little significance in his tone.

"I have no doubt," went on the squire, "that Mrs. Barton will be glad to have you pay her a short visit. I will get Percy to drive you down there."

"Thank you," answered the old man, dryly, "but it's only a little way, and I don't mind walking."

"Just as you prefer," said the squire, relieved by Uncle Jacob's declaration of his offer, for he knew that Percy would not enjoy the trip.

"I'll get ready to go at once, Albert. Oh, about my plan of opening a cigar store in Lakerville?"

"I cannot advise you to do it," rejoined the squire, tacitly. "You wouldn't make enough to pay your rent, or not much more."

"Don't the men in your factory smoke? There's a good many of them. If I could get their trade—"

"They smoke pipes for the most part," said the squire, hurriedly. "They'd find cigars too expensive."

"I meant to combine candy with cigars. That would be a help."

"They keep candy at the grocery store, Uncle Jacob."

"I see there isn't much show for me. Now if I only understood your business, you could give me something to do in the factory, Albert."

"But you don't, and, in fact, Uncle Jacob, it's too hard work for a man of your age."

"Then what would you advise me to do, Albert?" asked the old man, earnestly.

Squire Marlowe assumed a thoughtful look. In fact, he DISCHARGES.

THREE days later, while on his way to the factory, Bert overlooked Luke Crandall, who was employed like himself in pegging shoes.

"Have you heard the news, Bert?" asked his friend.

"No; what is it?"

"All the peggers are to be discharged, you and I, and the two other boys."

"Is that true?" asked Bert, stopping short, and surveying his friend with a look of dismay.

"Yes; I wish it wasn't."

"What is the reason?"

"The squire has bought a pegging machine, and he has hired a man from out of town to run it. So he will have no need of us."

"How soon is he going to put it in?" asked Bert, with a sinking heart.

"Next Monday. At the end of this week we shall be discharged."

"What are you going to do?" Bert inquired after a pause.

"I shall be all right. I have an uncle who keeps a store in Bradford, and I am going there to tend in the store, and shall board in the family. What shall you do?"

"I don't know," answered Bert soberly. "This has come on me so suddenly, that I haven't had time to think."

"There's precious little chance for a boy in Lakerville, unless he goes to work on a farm."

"I don't even know if there is a chance to do that. All the farmers are supplied with help. Besides, they generally pay a boy in his board and clothes, and I need money to help support my mother."

"Isn't old Marlowe your uncle?"

"No, but he is my mother's cousin."

"Then he ought to do something for you out of relationship."

"I don't expect it," answered Bert. "He appears to feel very little interest in us."

They had reached the factory, and entering were soon at work. Before noon the bad news was confirmed, and the boys were informed that their services would not be required after Saturday night.

At dinner Bert informed his mother, and she too was dismayed. It was a calamity she had never dreamed of. She supposed Bert was sure of continued employment in pegging till he was old enough to be employed in some other part of the business.

"I don't see what we shall do, Bert," she said. "There is no other shop in Lakerville. If there were you might get a chance there."

"There is no business of any kind here outside of Marlowe's shop."

THE TWENTY DOLLAR BILL.

IN order to understand what followed it is necessary to explain that the evening previous Bert and his mother found themselves out of money. About a dollar was due the latter for covering halls, but it would not be paid for three days, and meanwhile they were in an embarrassing condition.

"What shall we do?" asked Mrs. Barton with a troubled look. "If Uncle Jacob were only here, I would ask his advice."

"He left a note to be opened if we got into trouble," said Bert, brightening up.

"So he did. Do you think the time has come, Bert?"

"I have no doubt of it. Where is it, mother?"

"I put it in a bureau drawer in my room."

"Shall I go up and get it?"

"No; I will do so, as I know exactly where it is."

She went up stairs, and returned almost immediately with the letter in her hand. Bert produced his knife and cut open the envelope at one end. Then, drawing out the contents, he found them to be a half sheet of note paper and a bank bill.

"It's a twenty dollar bill, mother!" he exclaimed joyfully.

"Shall I read the note?"

"Yes, read it, Bert!"

Bert read as follows:

MY DEAR NIECE—As I know that your income is small, and you are liable in case of sickness or loss of employment to need help, I put a twenty dollar bill into this envelope, which I wish you to use freely. Do not fear that it will inconvenience me to give it. My health is good, and I hope to earn my living for years to come.

Your affectionate uncle,

JACOB MARLOWE.

"Dear Uncle Jacob!" said the widow gratefully "how good and kind he is! With his small savings I don't feel that he can afford to be so generous."

"I will pay him back some time, mother."

"You think then that we are justified in using it, Bert?"

"Uncle Jacob meant us to do so. Before it is gone I shall probably find something to do, and then I may gradually be able to pay back the money."

"In that case, Bert, I am afraid we must break into it tomorrow. Probably Mr. Jones can change it for us."

So it happened the next evening that Bert, with the kerosene can in his hand, went to the store, entering, as already described, just as Percy left it with the bill which he had purchased on the impulse of the moment.

"I would like two quarts of kerosene, Mr. Jones," said Bert, handing over the can.

The proprietor went to one corner of the store to fill the can, and brought it back.

"Please take your pay out of this," said Bert, handing him the twenty dollar bill.

Mr. Jones started in surprise, and his face darkened crimsonly. He scanned the desk on which he remembered placing his own twenty dollar bill, and it was nowhere to be seen.

"Why, you audacious young thief!" he exclaimed in a fury.

"What do you mean?" demanded Bert, angrily.

CHAPTER I. AT WEST POINT.

That the four years' arduous course at West Point Academy was finished.

Who of us that have been through the study, drill and training at that admirable institution can forget a single day of the eventful term spent there?

With what twinkling we made our way up the long, sloping hill to the array of buildings and penetrated our "appointment," which some of us had brought all the way from the Pacific slope or the Gulf, picturing in our mind what West Point looked like, and how we would conduct ourselves after we got there! And, as is always the case, how different the reality proved from the ideal!

And then what could look more awe inspiring than the upper classmen, as we caught sight of them here, there, and everywhere, eyeing us as we can imagine that cannibals might eye a party of prisoners from which they are to select their victims.

It all comes back again. How those grim old physicians, after compelling us to shed every thread of clothing, examined us from head to foot. They thumped our ribs, listened to the heart beats, tested our eyesight, and so on, until we felt as though we would give worlds to get out of the torture room and back again to the farm or shop.

There was Dolph Ashton, who had come all the way from Oregon. He was one of the brightest youths ever born on the Pacific slope, and was intended by nature for a soldier. He stripped like a young Akela, and his mental attainments were marvelous.

But alas! one of his eyes was a little deficient, and proved unequal to the work of reading a line of fine print shown on the opposite side of the room. Dolph whistled cheerily as he packed his trunk and started for his distant home, but all the same I caught the glister of the tears under his eyelids, which he thought no one of us saw.

We had it pretty rough during the first year. The upper classmen showed us little mercy. They assumed fierce airs, and thundered all sorts of terrible reproofs when we forgot the "Mr.," or failed to turn the thumbs out or salute, or omitted one of a score of other minor points.

We had to play the servant to those lordly gentlemen, and sing and dance for their amusement. But the hazing was mild, and sometimes we had to laugh at our own performances. Besides, we had the consolation of knowing that one of these days we would emerge from the phoe shell and become upper classmen, and then we would take it out of the unfortunate fellows who came after us. And didn't we do it?

But I must not be too reminiscent, for I have set out to tell something about another cadet who was at the Academy at the same time as myself, though in another class.

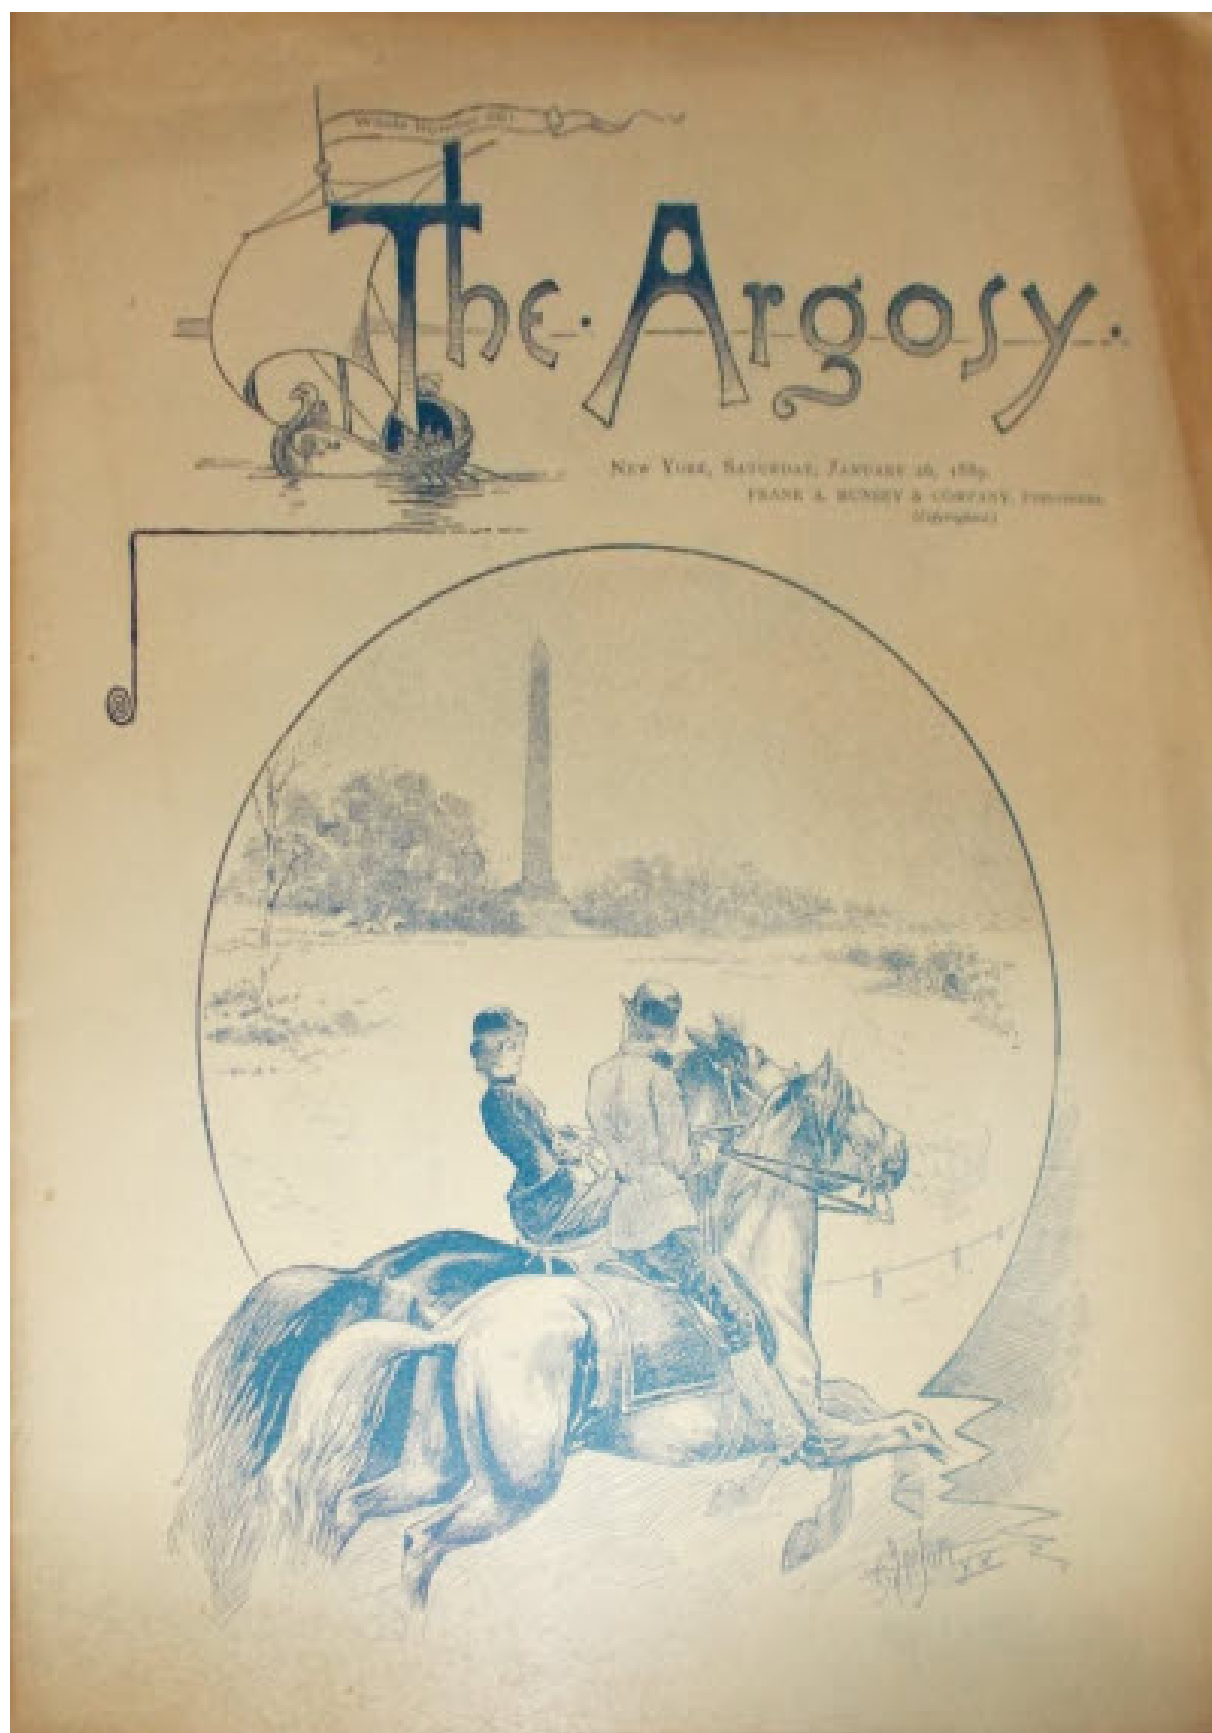

Dick Whitecomb was precisely seventeen years old on the memorable fifth of August when he walked with a stately step up the hill from that small station on the West Shore railroad. One hundred others beside himself successfully passed the physical and mental examination, and took up the course of study, which grows harder each year. A score dropped out at the "exam," six months later, and each semi annual winnowing disposed of a few more, until over half the class had been "found," as it is termed.

These were trying days to Dick Whitecomb. He vibrated between the first and second section, but was haunted by the continual horror of landing at the bottom among the "immortals." Not until he had entered upon his last year's course, with his forty odd classmates, can it be said that all fear was removed, and that the real golden sunlight was undimmed by a cloud.

Dick led the memorable last charge down the lower end of the Academy grounds, when his class, mounted on their fiery animals, thundered on a dead run from a point in front of the barracks almost to the steps of the hotel.

It was a thrilling sight, as the forty odd cadets in uniform, yelling like wild Indians, and swinging their sabers first on one side of their steeds and then on the other, clove the

CHAPTER V.

I START OUT FOR MYSELF.

NOW you sit down and write 'em all about it, and tings will come out all right yet, Massa Harry."

I was sitting in the rocking chair, which nothing would do but I must occupy, in the little cottage on the outskirts of Ridgboro, where my old nurse had gone to live with her daughter in law. After I had convinced her that I had never received my mother's letter telling me of the proposed sale, she suggested that I go and explain all about it to Mr. Docket. But I said I would rather not risk another snub from that quarter, and declared that I must get away from Ridgboro as soon as ever I could.

"What you goin' to? Out to Colorado?" asked Caroline.

"No, indeed," I replied. "And have people say that I had gone to live off my family? No, aunty, I'm going to New York to find some work and support myself," and I began rummaging in my pockets for a time table to see how soon I could start.

I felt as if I would stifle as long as I remained in that town, where everybody knew me and looked upon me—unjustly though it might be—as a selfish, heartless cad. It wasn't my fault, to be sure, that that all important letter had miscarried, but I couldn't very well call a town meeting and explain matters.

No, the only thing that was left me was to carry out my original intention when I left Blanford, so far as setting myself to work was concerned, and thus let my "actions speak louder than words." Now, however, there would be this difference in my circumstances: instead of living at home and having the presence of my family to spur me on, I must board myself and be my own guide and adviser.

"What a self pleasing, thoughtless prig I must have been all these years," I reflected, "that my own family should be so ready to believe the worst of me!"

"You jess come home with me, Massa Harry," said Aunt

Caroline, "and git some dinner. Then you feel better and can write to your folks how it all is. Riky's done got a real nice house, and I kin serve you up a dinner in de parlor just as slick!"

I was only too glad to go with the good old soul, who really seemed now to be the only person in all the world who clung to me.

And how refreshing it seemed to get into that quiet little home, humble though it was, and have the good people who lived there wait on me as if I had been a prince!

"Yes, aunty," I said, in reply to her request set down at the head of this chapter, "I'll write to mother now, from your house, if you'll let me have some paper. I've got a fountain pen in my pocket."

Here is what I wrote:

MY DEAR MOTHER:

Why did you not tell me the way things were going before I started for college last month?

I chanced to hear about the change in our fortunes only last night, from an outsider, and came home at once this morning, determined to give up my college course and go to work. I arrive to find that you have all gone West, evidently thinking the worst of me, and that the house has been put under the hammer to enable me to continue my education. The letter which "aunty" says you sent me putting the case before me must have miscarried in the mail, as I never received it. It is of course too late to stop the sale now, but I will never touch a penny of the proceeds. It must all go to father and the rest of you. I have thirty dollars, enough to keep me till I can find something to do. Don't worry about me. Only believe that I am more desirous of your affection and trust than you seem to have thought me.

With love to father and the girls.

Affectionately your son,

HARRY.

P. S. I will let you know in a day or two where I am settled so that you can write to me.

Somehow, when I had finished this letter I felt more independent and manly than I had at any time in my life—except possibly when I put on my first trousers.

I would show my family—I would show the people at Ridgboro—that so far from being dependent on my sisters, I would soon be in a position to share my income with them.

That I should succeed in securing a situation that would give me such an income, I had no shadow of doubt. To my inexperienced judgment it seemed that the one great obstacle, namely, my willingness to abandon college and take to work, had been already overcome.

Thus, after this letter had been written and I had eaten

I SEE AN ACCIDENT AND AM ASKED TO DO A FAVOR.

As soon as I realized that I had been robbed, I gave one wild, eager look about me, as if expecting to see the thief standing close at hand, holding my pocket book up in full view and waiting for me to charge down upon him. There were a few sly-looking individuals in the crowd, to be sure; but could I go up to each in turn and make my accusation without a particle of proof to back it except that my money was gone and they happened to be standing near me? Was it not much more likely that the real thief had long since threaded his way to the outskirts of the throng, and was by this time being whisked far away from the scene of his crime aboard an elevated train?

But I could not give up without making some effort to recover my property.

"I have been robbed since I have been standing here," I said to the fellow next me. "Did—did you happen to notice any suspicious-looking person?"

"Yes, several of them," he replied, with a laugh. "I always do in a crowd like this, and take precautions accordingly. Hope you didn't lose much."

I didn't make any reply, but forcing my way to a spot where I saw a policeman, I laid my case before him and asked if he could do anything to help me.

"I'm afraid not much more," he answered; "but if you will leave your address, I will send you word if we happen to find your property on any of the offenders that our men may bring in."

*Begun in No. 301 of THE ARGOSY.

I gave him my name and that of Hotel Riviera, wondering as I did so what the proprietor of the latter would say if he knew that one of his guests had not now a dollar in his pocket and no immediate prospect of putting any there.

How I looked back to ten minutes before when I was in no worse luck than a fellow who has met with one rebuff, but who had money enough on hand to support him for two weeks at least!

Suddenly I recollected the small change I always carried in my trousers pockets. I hurriedly counted it over and found that I had forty-seven cents.

"Enough to keep me from starving till day after tomorrow perhaps," I reflected dismally.

Meantime I had started mechanically to walk up Broadway, with some dim idea of getting back to the Riviera, and thus obtaining a chance to think over my situation quietly and make some sort of plans.

"I ought to give up my room at once," I told myself, but then, how could I, without paying the restaurant charges I had already incurred? Of course there was the resource of sending to my family for funds; but aside from the fact that I hated most desperately to come on them for help under the present circumstances, it would not be possible to receive a reply under five days at least. Meantime, should I remain at the hotel, my bill would have run up enormously. Was ever a fellow in a worse predicament?"

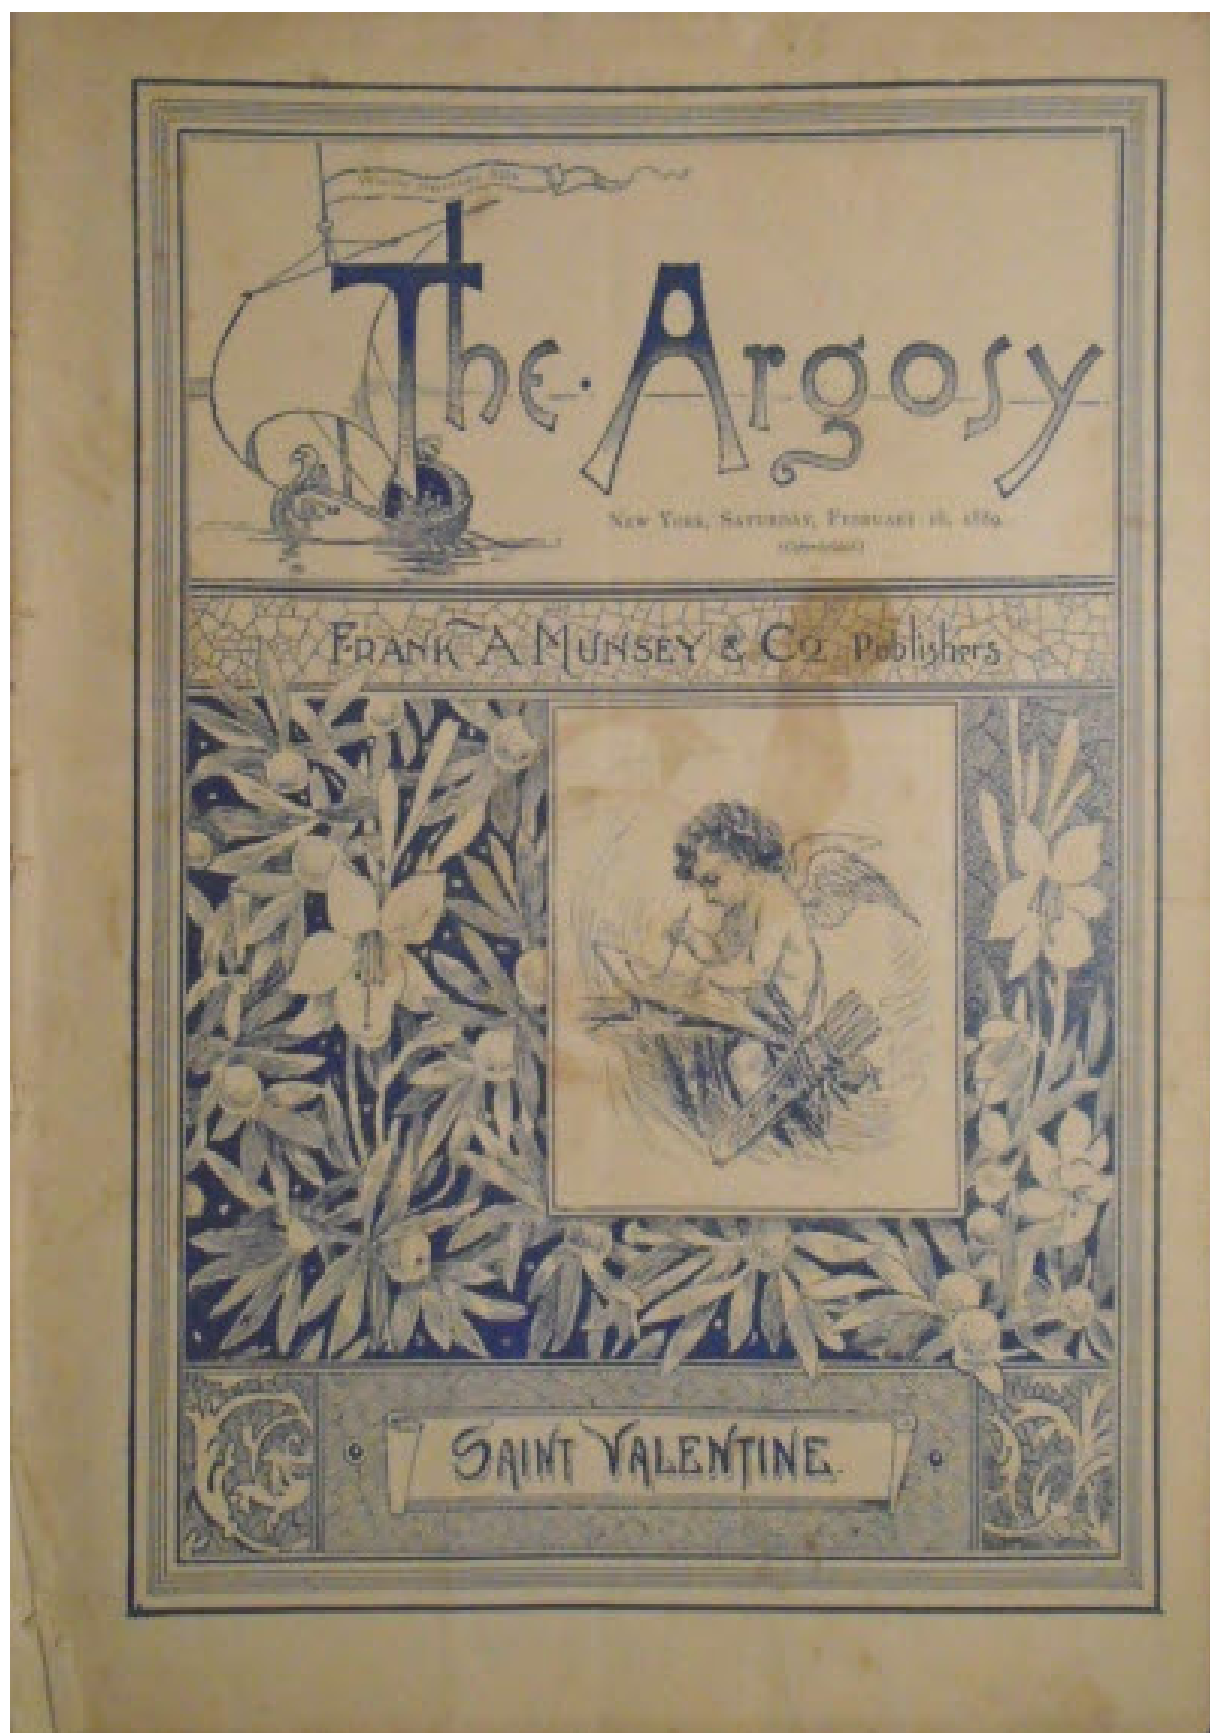

If I could only get something to do, anything that would insure me a few dollars, with which to square myself with fate, so to speak, and enable me to start off again on an entirely new basis! Even if I had felt that I could afford to expend a few pennies out of my scanty stock on a morning paper, I knew that in all probability it was now too late in the day to hope to secure any of the positions therein advertised.

So I trudged on, hopelessly almost, trying to realize that less than forty-eight hours had brought the proud, spirited, somewhat prodigal Blueford freshman to such a sorry pass.

All at once I bethought me of Clarence McKim. Perhaps I could obtain a place in the same firm as himself. It was a large one, I knew, and there might just chance to be a vacancy there. At any rate there could be no harm in trying.

Although he had not mentioned the nature of the business, he had told me the name—Russell & Ross—and that the factory was situated in the neighborhood of Fourteenth Street and the North River. I was up nearly as high as that by

CHAPTER X.

AN INFORMAL EXAMINATION.

INSTANTLY on arriving inside the court house, Mr. Sparks joined Prince, and conducted him to the office of the sheriff, where he found several persons who appeared to be awaiting the return of the deputy.

The prisoner looked at them with interest. He knew them all by sight; but their appearance did not at once give him any information in regard to the charge against him. Mr. Warden, Locke's father, was the most prominent person among them, and he seemed to be very much excited, though he couched his rather violent speech as the prisoner came in.

The cashier of the Gatebrook National Bank seemed to be interested, and Mr. Spear, the apothecary, sat in a corner reading a newspaper, as though he was not much concerned in the matter at issue. Lowden, one of Mr. Warden's clerks, looked as though he was there because he had been called for a special purpose.

"Then you found him," said Mr. Warden. "I was afraid he had left town by this time."

"I had no idea of leaving Gatebrook, Mr. Warden," put in Prince, mildly, though the words of the rich storekeeper seemed to convey an implication against him.

"I did not think you were a thief before," added Mr. Warden, whose excitement seemed to break out afresh when he saw the prisoner.

"And I am not a thief now, Mr. Warden," replied Prince, flushing making a new color on his brown cheek.

"Yes, you are! We can prove it!" said the rich man, perhaps excited all the more by the coolness and self-possession of the alleged culprit.

"Gently, if you please, Mr. Warden," interposed the deputy sheriff, who seemed to be in charge of the case. "Using such words will not put the matter forward at all."

"Gently! I should say so!" exclaimed the merchant, who stood upon lashing himself into a fury; and Prince began to think he was the person who had been robbed of the money. "I am not in favor of making a farce of this matter."

"I don't intend to make a farce of it, Mr. Warden; but I think it is proper to examine the prisoner before we proceed to extreme measures," added Mr. Sparks. "Perhaps he can explain all there is against him."

"He stole the money! It is as clear as anything in day-light can be!" persisted Mr. Warden. "We have looked over the evidence, and it is enough to hang a man if it were for murder."

"But every person charged with a crime ought to be allowed to explain himself."

"Let him do that in court when he is examined," replied the storekeeper.

"Of course he will do it then; but I wish to give him a chance to explain what there is against him; and I assure you, Mr. Warden, that this is the custom in dealing with such cases. Perhaps the prisoner will confess the crime, and restore the money which has been stolen," and he looked at the alleged culprit.

Prince only smiled in reply to the silent glance of the deputy.

"If he wants to confess, let him do so at once, and hand over the money he stole," added the excited man.

"He has not even been informed in detail of the charge against him."

"He knows about it better than any of us do. If he don't want to own up and give back the money, I am not in favor of fooling with the case. There is evidence enough to hold him on an examination," replied Mr. Warden. "Have you anything to say about this matter, Prince Henry?"

"I have only this to say: I am very much obliged to Mr. Sparks for the kindness he has extended to me; but it appears that I have been condemned unheard. I have nothing more to say," replied Prince, with all the inherent dignity of his character.

"Are you ready to confess?" demanded Mr. Warden, springing to his feet.

"No, sir!"

"I object to the continuance of the proceedings in this manner," interposed Mr. Sparks. "I intend to inquire into the facts of the robbery, Mr. Warden, and to give the prisoner an opportunity to explain the circumstances which bear against him, if he can. If you do not wish to take part in the examination, which is entirely informal, you are at liberty to retire."

"But I object to your making a farce of justice in this manner. You mean to give the fellow a chance to clear himself, if he can," stormed the merchant.

"Certainly, I do. But he may put me in the way of it."

THE MYSTERY OF THE MONEY.

"I CAN'T understand it at all!" exclaimed General Shellbrook, as he tossed his pocket book on the table, and proceeded to count a pile of bank bills he held in his hand. "There is certainly about twenty dollars missing."

"You are careless about your money, Raymond," said Mrs. Shellbrook. "You could not have had so much money as you thought you had."

"I am willing to admit that I am sometimes careless; but I have mislaid money from my pocket book at least a dozen times, and I have been very careful lately," replied General Shellbrook, as he began to count the bills.

"You must have made a mistake, father," added Roscoe Shellbrook, his son, who was watching the general's movements with the most intense interest, not to say anxiety.

"Don't interrupt me again," said the gentleman, impatiently, and without any other reply to the remark of Roscoe. General Shellbrook was the wealthiest and most distinguished citizen of Millgate, and doubtless the money he claimed to have lost was of little consequence to him; but, like the man who searched all the forenoon for a cent he had dropped in the street, he wanted to know where it had gone.

He went through the pile of bills three times, and evidently with the same result, for the count appeared to satisfy him. Then he examined the pocket book very carefully to ascertain if he had put any money in another compartment. It contained a few papers, but no bank bills.

"Count it, Roscoe," said he, throwing the bills upon the plate of his son, who had seated himself at the breakfast table.

The young gentleman was plainly used to handling money, for he fingered the bills both gracefully and expeditiously. He counted the money a second time, drumming on the table in as good time as an experienced teller in a bank.

"One hundred and sixty dollars, I make it, father," he reported, when he had finished the count.

At this moment the general's daughter, a young lady of sixteen, as pretty as a picture, entered the room, and seated herself at the table.

"Here, Olga, count these bills," said the general, as he tossed the pile upon her plate.

General Shellbrook had made a fortune in the Russia trade before he went to Millgate, where he had more than tripled it because it was impossible for him to lead an inactive life. He had been in Russia several times, which explains how his daughter happened to have a Russian name. Probably, if he had had another daughter, he would have called her Dagmar.

The beautiful girl took the dirty bills from her plate, and proceeded to count them. Her brother watched her with a sort of contempt of her manner of handling money. It was graceful, but it was not after the style of a bank officer.

CHAPTER IV.

THE UNDISCOVERED OWNER OF THE TWINNERS.

"SAVE me! save me!" cried the gentleman from New York, as he came to the surface of the water.

Pike was almost paralyzed by the accident, or rather by seeing his friend dive into the water to deliver Mr. Briggs. But the cry of the sufferer indicated that he was not seriously injured by the blow from the boom. The schooner had been beating toward the shore, and had tacked at the moment Pike first obtained a sight of her. She darted off as the gathered headway; but the skipper immediately put the helm down and she came up into the wind.

Pike saw a boat a little way up the wharf, and he rushed with all his might to obtain it. In another moment he was sculling it toward the scene of the disaster. He frequently looked behind him to assure himself that the unfortunate persons in the water had not sunk out of sight.

The magnate's son was an indifferent swimmer, and Pike felt that he was more likely to drown himself than to save his friend. There was something very strange in the movements of both the young men in the water. But before Pike Bristow could reach them, the skipper had hauled both of them to the deck of the yacht.

The man in charge of the schooner filled away again to prevent the craft from drifting upon the wharf. Pike could not make it out how both of the young men had been saved so quickly, when he had been almost sure that one or both of them would be drowned. The rescue had been effected so suddenly and so successfully that it looked like a mystery to the observer.

He had never known Roscoe to do such a thing before, or to exhibit the qualities which lead a person to perform such a heroic act. The magnate's son was not a particularly courageous young man, and it was odd that he thought any-

PURSUERS AND PERISHED.

BURKE HARRISON drew up his mustang and cast a searching look over the rolling prairie, which stretched in every direction to the very edge of the horizon.

"Well, Prince," said he, addressing his black steed, whose neck he affectionately patted, "you and I have been through a good many tough scrimmages in the last two years, but this is the hardest chase of them all. I hope we'll pull through, though; but it isn't settled yet, by a long shot."

The cowboy was in the situation of one looking for something that he did not want to find, and which, unfortunately, he promptly found.

The keen gray eyes, which swept over the broad prairie plain lighted him, now, hardly a half mile away, a half dozen horsemen, bearing down upon him at a swift gallop. Burke was far up in western Texas, and was returning to his stock, a long distance to the southeast, when he almost rode into a party of Comanches, who at that particular period were in an ugly mood toward the settlers and cattlemen who had come into their midst.

A hot interchange of shots followed, and the Texan marksmen wounded the foremost warrior from the back of his party with his Winchester, desperately wounded another, and then, feeling the "wads were full" of red men, threw himself forward on his mustang, and sent him flying on a dead run toward home, which was a great deal further off than was agreeable to the individual chiefly concerned.

Ordinarily, Burke would not have felt any misgiving for a race for life, so long as it was his privilege to ride his splendid Prince; but just now there were two reasons for special uneasiness on his part.

Prince had been forced to such a hard and continuous pace during the earlier part of the day, that he was in need of rest; but the mustang is a tough, enduring animal, when capable of making as many

THE COUNCIL ON THE PRAIRIE.

THE crack of the rifle from the prairie above was a sharp reminder to Burke Harmon that his interest in his new acquaintance was leading him into a dangerous forgetfulness of the perils by which both of them were surrounded.

"The bushes seem thicker here than elsewhere," he added. "Sit down on the ground for a minute or two, while I look around once more."

Miss Harland instantly complied, her agitation being no greater than that of her friend, whose concern was more for her than for himself.

Though the clipping of the leaves had been plainly heard by the Texan, he was certain the shot was not aimed at him. It took but a second or two to return to where he had left Prince lying on the ground. An exclamation of anger escaped him. The animal was dead. The bullet that skimmed through the vegetation had first passed through his brain.

Like every horseman, Burke was attached to his animal, and a pang of grief mingled with his indignation that the Comanche had aimed at his steed instead of at its owner.

But the danger was too pressing to allow any time to be wasted in regrets. With a glance at the lifeless animal that had been his companion in many a peril, he paused only long enough to make sure that none of his enemies was in sight at that

STARTLING DISCOVERY.

THE Indian's reply to Father Bartolo's question was that the wound had been accidentally inflicted by another warrior. The good man knew that when such affairs take place among American Indians they are never accidents. The individual who "didn't know it was loaded" invariably belongs to the Caucasian race.

The father sternly told the wounded man that he was telling a falsehood, and demanded the truth. The Comanche then confessed that the gun which sent the bullet had been aimed at him, but said it was fired by one of his people with whom he had a quarrel about the ownership of a horse in the course of the afternoon.

That night he told the truth, as Father Bartolo viewed it, and but for the absence of Miss Harland he would have accepted it without further question, but he was not yet through with the Comanche.

His next inquiry was as to why he had come to the white man's ranch to secure attention to his wound. The reply was touching. The Comanches were aware it was time for their good father to make them a visit, and were looking longingly for him. They knew he was somewhere in the country, and that he often made his home among the white men who owned the cattle ranches. Mar-queta-go hoped his good father was at this ranch, and he set out to find him because no one else could do so much for him.

Father Bartolo did not doubt the truth of this statement, for the same thing had taken place more than once before in his experience. Holding one of the candles in his hand that he might see better, he pretended to examine the Indian's wound more closely. Suddenly raising his head, he looked sternly at the face of the Indian, and said in a threatening voice:

"Mar-queta-go has lied; that wound was caused by the bullet of a white man!"

This was the finishing stroke. The Comanche was sure that there was something in the appearance of the hurt

A RACE ON THE ATLANTIC.

"SAIL, ho! Right ahead of us!" cried Ned Wilson, the young second mate of the good ship Flying Cloud, as he caught sight of a faint purplish grey spot on the southern horizon. Captain Blake, the vessel's master, made his appearance on deck at that moment.

"Where is she, Ned?" he inquired.

The young officer pointed her out.

"Is she coming this way, do you think?" asked the captain, who intently watching the strange sail for a minute or two.

"I think not, sir," replied Ned. "If she was, I think we should begin to see her more distinctly than we do."

The captain's eyes were still fixed on the distant speck.

"I'll bet my money that it is the Southern Cross!" he exclaimed with evident excitement. "Ned, my boy, you have pretty good eyes. Get your glass, and hop up to the fore royal mast, and see what you can make of her."

Active as a cat, Ned soon reached the royal yard, upon which he comfortably seated himself, preparatory to bringing his telescope to bear upon the stranger. A little manceuvring sufficed him to find her; but she was so far away—quite beyond what he could make out nothing beyond the fact that she was apparently a ship of about the same size as the Flying Cloud. He remained on his elevated perch watching her for fully a quarter of an hour, a period long enough to satisfy him that both ships were standing in the same direction, and then he descended.

"Well, what do you make of her?" demanded the skipper.

Ned stared fully at that he had seen and all that he surmised—for a sailor is often able to discernly guess at a great deal when he sees but little; and when he had replied to the somewhat severe cross-examination to which he was subjected, Captain Blake reiterated his former opinion.

"It is the Southern Cross, just enough! Mr. Bryce—to the mast—be good enough to mount the watch, sir, and see if you cannot get those sails to set something less like so many hags."

There had been a heavy shower earlier in the evening, which had usually stretched the new canvas, and now that it was again dry it

AN EXCITING PROSPECT.

VISITORS at Old Point Comfort remember well the little steam launch Midge, or yacht, an old Jake Berry, the owner, insisted on calling her. She was reasonably well adapted for a trip to Norfolk, or up the James River, although even in these sheltered waters the passengers might suffer some discomforts if a storm came up, owing to the lack of accommodations.

She was only thirty-five feet long, with an after cabin capable of holding four persons without any very great amount of crowding; an engine room where two more might sleep or seek shelter from a storm, while forward, from amidships to the bow, there was no other protection than that afforded by a canvas awning.

A jaunty little craft she was, however, and among her numerous

CHAPTER IV.

THE WRECK.

ONE glimpse of the steep standing toward the island told Captain Jake beyond a question that there had been good foundation for his previous suspicion. Only very weighty reasons could have induced these men to cross the Sound in such a gale, and this fact gave evidence of what manner of enemies the old pirate had.

The Midge was in a dangerous position, unable to make harbor on either shore; but yet her owner paid more attention to the little craft which was trying to beat dead to windward than to the safety of himself and his passengers.

"We've got to find something in the way of a shelter before long,"

* Begun in last week's ARGOSY.

he said to Eriens: "but if there was any first chance of being able to run across the Sound I'd try it rather than trust myself on the island with them black fellows."

Twenty minutes later, when the Midge was within half a mile of the shore and standing to windward of the old pirate's home, Eriens uttered a cry of dismay as he pointed astern, and for one instant all hands believed the ship had gone down.

During these few seconds nothing could be seen of the little craft, and then, struggling desperately against the mighty wind, the mast-head appeared above a huge wave, as she tumbled before the gale in the direction of Sandy Point.

Captain Jake said: "They've given it up, and got about; but it shows us what chance we should have in trying the same maneuver. The Midge would go down like a stone if we jammed her into the trough of the sea, as they did the ship."

"Well, we needn't worry about them any longer, although it doesn't seem to me that they tried very hard to get at Captain Dow," Eriens said in a tone of relief.

"If there had been a sailor man aboard he'd have known how foolish

THE SEARCH.

WHILE the black man was speaking, Captain Jake's glance fell upon the jewelry and coins which were spread on the table, and the fear that these might be seized by the intruders gave him unusual courage.

Regardless of the weapons, he moved towards the fire as if bent on assuming a more comfortable position, and while the black men were trying to decide how their search should be begun, he seized one of the rusty horse pistols from the wall. Aiming it point blank at the nearest stranger, he pulled the trigger.

It is possible that serious injury might have been inflicted upon some person in the room if the ancient weapon had been discharged. Fortunately it was an old flintlock, and inasmuch as there was no priming in the pan, the hammer fell harmlessly upon the stone.

Before the old man could so much as raise his head again, the intruders were upon him. In an instant two were holding him by either arm, while the third stood near by with drawn swords to prevent the boys from attempting a rescue.

"It is not purpose to interfere that for which we have sought so long," the eldest of the party said, while he deliberately lashed the captain to the chair with a thin but strong piece of whipcord. "In order to prevent any interference with our work, it is necessary that we make prisoners of you all for a short time."

Captain Jake gave vent to a deep groan. The pirate's house, from which he expected to be paid for the loss of the Midge, had already attracted the attention of the new comers, and the belief that all this would be taken from him had clouded the outlook of success.

"Do the cords bind too tightly?" one of the strangers asked solicitously, and the old man shook his head dejectedly, as he replied:

"It ain't the best to say that I've chinked about."

Then two of the men went toward Everett, and he, recognizing the weakness of resistance, said before they could lay their hands on him:

"Simply tell me what is wanted, and I'll do all I can toward forwarding matters, in order that your business may be finished as soon as possible."

"You are very wise," the leader said, affably.

"It is not our intention to be unnecessarily harsh; but we have come for our own property, and do not intend to run any risk of failure. If you and the other young gentlemen will take a seat on the bench, we will try not to inflict pain while preventing you from meddling with us."

Obedying this order, the boys seated themselves, and in a few moments their hands and feet were bound together, the cords passing directly beneath the benches, but in such a manner as to allow them some little freedom of movement.

"I beg your pardon," the man then said to Mrs. Houghton and Maize, "but if you were fully aware of our position, it would be possible to understand why we should neglect no precautions."

Even while speaking, he began to fix their hands, and when this had been done, led them to the bench beside the boys, as he added, "If you give us your word not to rise without our permission, there will be no necessity of fastening you as securely as the others."

THE BLACK MEN STUDIED THE PAPER MOST ATTENTIVELY.

CHAPTER IV.

THE SEARCH FOR THE BOAT.

CLARKE and those with the boat to others with some life-rafts and a boat. Long before they arrived at the foot of Blackrock they saw the jagged, towering walls of ice that loomed above the face of the cliff, and entered their spearsheads in to be meeting. When they arrived, their shouting and calling got no answer for a time, then, distant voices responded eagerly, but they were only the voices of the other party of boats, who were hastening back, with Dr. Noble, the principal, two of the teachers, and several other persons.

There the fact transpired that neither Telford nor Nina was there; and the ladies's attention gave them an oming of a second tragedy. No doubt Telford, in descending the cliff alone in search for Nicholas, had lost his footing and fallen into the sea.

Two of the fishermen were dispatched to examine the face of the cliff, which they did with a fresh lantern. Coming to the place on which Telford's light was fixed, they reported the terrible and terrible state of the spot, from the brink of which masses of rock had been projected, while a rag of grey homages, presumably from Telford's garments, was found.

There was no longer a doubt possible. There had been a double tragedy; Telford had lost his life in searching for Nicholas. The tide was going out, the current was swift as a miller's race, as no answer came back for all their calling, both boys must be drowned.

The fishermen searched every cranny along the coast to which a current might drift the bodies, and round was beyond the bay, lying on their sides to listen to the dripping silence for long hours. Once or twice a fainter sound was heard, faint, whispering cry from afar, which, being described to the men, was set down as the cry of some waterbird, for it was long since that at least since Telford must have fallen in, and he must either have been drowned, or be clinging to some support near at hand, not yet able to swim as long in his clothes. Yet they did all that mortal could do to find a strong wind blew up from shore, and they were obliged to return lest they be blown out to sea. And so, promising to reach the returning tide, which would probably bring back the bodies and return them in some low black boat, the fishermen went home.

QUIET COURAGE: WHAT THEY WENT THROUGH.*

CHAPTER VII.

THE REVEREND PAROLE.

THE two sailors who had been sent to bring Telford to shore helped him to stand and to breathe a few breaths of fresh air. He learned from them that the Mr. Harrington whom he had heard mentioned was a senior partner in the firm that owned the Amal, and that he was going out to the St. James's Islands.

"Capt. Graham knows him like glove," added one of the sailors. "Because he speaks out, says the way the vessel does not hurt much and sails all around."

Telford's attention was a rough looking fellow, whose name appeared to be the first of his name, as he was repeatedly called him, and Telford thought the designation was inappropriate. He had noticed in the man, however, he seemed well disposed to the cause. Both of the sailors noticed him at the bottom of the deck, where they had been on a lot of work in the last of the previous night, with a lot of rope for a while, then they left him.

It happened morning yet, and Mr. Harrington had not yet come on deck. As Telford had to wait for his name was of Telford. He seemed very much, in studying the ship and people there, which he did, and noticed that they all, with the exception of Telford, were sailors, who seemed to be in the captain's service. Some of them were in the captain's service, some were in the captain's service, and some were in the captain's service. They were all in the captain's service, and some were in the captain's service.

Something was very evidently wrong about the ship. Telford was the greatest for a while. He was very much about.

Telford was something in the way of a sailor, and feeling stronger with every breath, till he saw the ship on the bridge.

*Reprint from the Argosy of 1889.

Apparently the man, a smoothly shaven, disagreeable man, came out to him, and imperiously told him to get up and come along to the skipper.

"You'll have to find a hand there, mate," said Telford, good humoredly. "It's a night and a day in the water here, and the party's weak."

"Here we haven't any sick men aboard for the last six months of the gentleman on your ship," returned the fellow, half enough for the leading captain to hear. Then, getting seriously tested under these encouraging remarks, "There, mate, it's not impossible, you'll be long when I take you," and he kicked the gentleman down heavily to the side with his outside weapon.

Telford, against his pain, scrambled to his feet, but had to cling to the rail to keep from while his head rolled heavily just the worst started in his great fall.

"Thought I could catch you," chuckled the fellow, when the faint skipper groined his apologetic. "There, mate, there, shake it down—good enough—shall I give you another shake?"

Shocked though he was by this outrageous treatment, Telford was too proud to be irritated to such a man, and continued to edge along the side of the ship by holding on to the bulwark. All he could under the captain's grim regards. Then he recovered his senses, and with the air of a gentleman, and bowed good morning.

"Stand up, you fellow, and stand there," bellowed the fellow, who had been from the moment he comprehended that he had a poor gentleman at his mercy. He had been ready to show him before on Harrington's account, but now he had him on his own, and the feeble strength of it will prove and hand from behind for Telford.

Remembering that a skipper is king on board his own ship, Telford bowed, and then his support to the man on the ground, but caught directly a moment, and then fell on his knees.

FIVE minutes later, as Gilbert was closing the door, Carl suggested:

"The doctor and Mrs. Crawford would like to see you for some time," she said.

"My dear," said the doctor, "this is the young man who has come from Carl."

Gilbert followed Jane into the library, where Dr. Crawford and his wife were seated. He looked with interest at the woman who had such power as a physician in Carl, and was warmly greeted by her. The old lady was dressed in very light brown hair and grey eyes, and a disapproving expression which seemed to be her.

CHAPTER I.

THE NEW HOME.

A BORN of women, with a small graveness in his face, wedged along the narrow path. He was of great height for his age, strongly built, and had a frank, attractive face. He was naturally of a cheerful disposition, but at present his face was grave, and his mind a study of anxiety. This was partly for a matter of business which he considered that he was driven from his own home, and that his wife and child were separated from their native home. He was, in addition, a great scholar and a rather unusual amount of physical strength. These two last items were very valuable, especially in the present, as he was engaged for the summer and winter of his life.

His wife and child had been together, and from time to time he had to go to the market where he was with a few other hands, which he had managed fairly successfully with his own business, and he was now.

I cannot remember the time, for each of it is the day Carl Crawford met at the market of his own home. He had to go and see to the market where he was engaged, and he was now.

A few words about Carl Crawford. He was a man of a wide spreading smile, with a heart of mother and a study of anxiety.

"I will not have a little while," he said to himself, and seeing the action in the market, he went down the ground, and then himself on the road.

"This is interesting," he murmured, as he went on his way, he looked up through the trees to the sky above. "I don't know when I have ever been so tired. It's

FRANK'S VINDICATION.

FRANK looked up and eyed the policeman in amazement.

"What do you mean?" he asked.

"You know well enough what I mean, you young rascal! You caught me in the act."

"In what act?"

"Murderin' and robbin' your employer! You'll swing on the gallows yet, you young villain!"

Frank hardly knew whether to be most amazed or indignant. He could not realize that the officer was in earnest, but when he found his hands pressed in handcuffs, he decided that he was in serious trouble.

"Listen!" he said. "I only just returned from an errand, and, entering the office to report to Mr. Snobden, I found him lying motionless on the floor."

"That's too thin! You don't fool me so easy."

"How could I—a boy—strike down a man like Mr. Snobden?"

"I've heard of a boy murderer who only weighed seventy-three pounds. You're a stout, strong boy, and you probably crept up behind the old man and gave him a blow with that ruler."

"You must be crazy!"

"None of your impudence, boy! I shall take you along to the station house as soon as I can get help for the old man. Come with me while I rap for assistance."

He turned Frank to accompany him to the sidewalk, and rapped for help. Two other officers appeared on the scene, and together they went back to the office.

"What has the boy done?" asked officer Snow of the first policeman.

"Tried to murder his employer," answered the other gruffly.

Snow looked scrutinizingly at Frank. He had a kindly, benevolent face, and had a boy at home about Frank's age.

"Did you see him do it?" he asked.

"I saw him breathe over the old man just after it happened."

"No, you contradicted he did it? Boy, how long had you been in the office?"

"Just got in. I had been on an errand."

"Do you know of any one being with Mr. Snobden?"

"There was no one with him when I went out."

"You see," said the first policeman, "I understand my business, I do."

"No offense to you, Grubb, but if this boy isn't the one who attacked Mr. Snobden, we must find the man that did."

"If Mr. Snobden would only come to, he would tell you," said Frank.

*Reprint from The Argosy of last week.

"A good suggestion. Is there any water in the building? Perhaps we can bring him to."

"Yes, I'll go for some," and then Frank stopped short, for, with his hands confined by handcuffs, he was helpless.

"Unfasten the handcuffs, Grubb. Surely you are not afraid the boy will prove too much for you?"

"If he escapes, you will be to blame," said Grubb, reluctantly.

"READ THAT, FRANK. IT IS FROM YOUR UNCLE GEORGE."

complying with the directions of officer Snow, who, he knew, was a man of influence at headquarters.

Frank returned with a pail of water, which officer Snow took from him, and bathed the face of the prostrate man. It had the desired effect, for he shivered slightly, and opened his eyes.

"Where am I?" he asked, wildly. "What has happened?"

"You have been struck down. We found you on the floor. Can you tell us who attacked you? Was it this boy?" pointing to Frank.

"No—no," answered Snobden.

"Who was it, then?"

"Help me up! Let me think!" and he put his hand to his head with an air of doubt.

Officer Snow eyed Grubb with a glance of triumph.

THE TELL-TALE NOTE.

"I MEAN that John Carter paid me this money only a short time since," Gerrish said to the officers, in explanation of his exclamation recorded at the close of the last chapter.

"In payment of a debt?"

"No," answered Gerrish, who was shrewd enough to see that it was wise in this instance to tell the truth. "I saw that he had a set of bills and asked him to lend me something, as I was hard up."

"And he gave you this bill?"

"Yes."

"Have you any others?"

"No. You had better search me, and satisfy yourselves."

The officers did so, but discovered nothing else.

"Now will you let me go?"

"No. We shall need you as a witness even if you are not a conspirator."

"I am a friend of Mr. Snobden," said Gerrish boldly.

"I thought you said you didn't know him."

"I don't, but my son is in his employ."

"Who is your son?"

"The boy who brought you here."

In the hurry of the moment Frank had not mentioned that the man with Carter was his stepfather, and this relation astonished the officers. They did not know whether to believe it or not.

"Then perhaps the boy was in the plot," suggested Grubb suspiciously.

"No, he wasn't. I ain't over fond of him, but he ain't one of that set. Take me along, gentlemen! I'm willing to go. If I can help you about this matter, I will. Mr. Snobden is the employer of my son, and I wish him well. He won't die, will he?"

"No; his injuries do not appear to be serious, though your friend dealt him a powerful blow."

"Don't call that black-hearted rascal my friend! I only hope you'll get hold of him."

"Have you any idea where he is likely to conceal himself?"

"No, I haven't, but I don't believe he'll stay in the city, or come back to his room. He has lived in Philadelphia."

"Then very likely he will go there. I will send an alarm to the Central Office."

It was finally decided to take Gerrish to the private residence of Mr. Snobden to see if that gentleman could identify him.

Luke made no opposition, but on the contrary expressed satisfaction when told that this was to be done.

"I'd like to meet the old gentleman," he said.

He was taken up into Mr. Snobden's bed chamber. The merchant, his head bandaged up, was lying back in an easy chair. He looked up as Gerrish was brought into his presence.

"Do you recognize this man, Mr. Snobden?" asked officer Swain.

The old man eyed the visitor keenly.

"No," he said slowly, "I don't think I ever saw him before."

"Then he is not the man who assaulted you?"

"Certainly not," answered the merchant sharply. "Didn't I tell you that it was my nephew—John Carter—who struck me?"

"This man is a friend of John Carter. He was found in his company."

"He might have been found in better company," said Silas Snobden grimly.

"And we found on his person this blood-stained bill," continued Grubb.

Silas Snobden took it in his hand.

FRANK was taken by surprise, but instinctively tried to throw off the grasp of his stepfather.

"Let me alone!" he said.

"You heard what I said? Give me your wagon."

By this time Frank had recovered his self-possession, and faced Loue Gerrish resolutely.

"I will not do it," he said. "You have not the least claim to my wagon."

"You will find out whether I have or not. Ain't I your stepfather?"

"I suppose so."

"You only suppose so! Don't you know it?"

"Yes," burst forth Frank, "I know it, and am ashamed of it."

Frank's reply was to button up his coat.

"You will have to get money somewhere else, Mr. Gerrish," he said. "I tell you once for all that you won't get it from me."

Loue was by this time out of patience. He was not at the best a good tempered man, and it was very aggravating to be defied by a boy of sixteen, upon whom he fancied he had a claim for obedience.

In a savage fit he aimed a blow at Frank which would have hurt the boy seriously if it had fallen. But his arm was checked in a strong grasp. Turning quickly to see who had interfered with him, he met the steady look of a man of thirty-eight, or perhaps a little older. This man was evidently a gentleman—in the social sense of that term—for he was handsomely dressed, and had that quiet air of authority which comes from acknowledged position.

"What do you mean by interfering with me?" demanded Gerrish, almost foaming at the mouth with passion.

CHAPTER I. ON THE ERIE ROAD.

"PAPER, magazines, all the popular novels! Can't I sell you something this morning?"

Joshua Bassoon turned as the train boy addressed him, and looked at him earnest, sun-burned face, lit up with pleasant expectation, for he was a farmer's son and was making his first visit to the city of New York.

"I ain't much on story reading," he said. "I tried to read a story book once but I couldn't seem to get interested in it."

"That was the name of it?" said Fred, the train boy, smiling.

"It was the 'Pillar's Progress,' or some such name. It had pictures in it. Aunt Nancy gave it to me for a birthday present once."

"I have heard of it."

"It was a mighty queer book. I couldn't make head nor tail on't."

"All books are not like that."

"I don't feel like reading. It's a real sight more interesting looking out of the window at the sights. I'm going to New York to spend a week," said Joshua, with an air of importance.

"That's where I live," said the train boy.

"Do you? Then you might tell me where to put up. I've got ten dollars. I reckon that ought to keep me a week."

Fred smiled.

"That is more than enough to keep me," he said, "but it costs a stranger considerable to get around, but I shall have to see my friends."

It was a train on the Erie road, and the car had just passed Middletown, and the seat beside him was vacant. The train boy had scarcely left the car when a stylishly dressed young man who had been sitting behind, came forward and accosted Joshua.

"Is this seat engaged?" he asked.

"Not as I know of," answered the young farmer.

"Then with your permission I will take it," said the stranger.

"Yes, of course; I hadn't no objection." "He's dreadful polite!" thought Joshua.

AN IMPUDENT YOUNG SAILOR.

"HEY, Billy, run round the building, and head her off that way," said a young man, wearing the dress of a sailor to another in the same garb, as he began to move toward a woman who appeared to be quickening her pace in order to escape him.

"In two hours!" exclaimed the one addressed as Billy. "In an getting your head into the tar kettle, Tom Batters, and let your shipmates the police will get their paws on you if you don't give up that game."

"It was you that first got your peepers on her, and you wanted I should see her."

"But I didn't want you to meddle with her. She is the prettiest girl I ever set eyes on, and I looked at her as I should at a fine picture."

"I don't mean to harm her, but I am going to make her acquainted with me," persisted Tom, as he watched the retreating maiden. "Come along, or we shall lose sight of her."

"Not I, my lark! I am going on board if you mean to run after the girl. I don't put my nose into the tar pot, and it is not respectable or even decent for you to do so, Tom. Come, let up, and don't vex the lady. I think she has been on board of that big

PERRY GARDNER AND HIS MOTHER.

THE BOAT was in mid ocean when she encountered the terrible storm which doomed her to destruction, though she might have weathered it in safety if, unfortunately, her sailors had not been startled.

But Perry Gardner obtained the main facts of the situation, learned that the steamer was not in immediate danger of sinking, though she was heading at a rate which rendered the escape inevitable at no distant point of time.

Reinforcements would keep her afloat for some hours longer; but maddening, pitching and plunging madly in the tremendous seas which the hurricane had created. It seemed as though at every mad plunge she was slipping, but there was still a great and buoyant power left in her.

Looking to her cabin passengers, and several hundred emigrants in her charge. They had been driven on to her by the efforts of the crew to keep them there. In the officers and seamen told them to go to prevent danger; they would not believe it.

But the cabin passengers had been asked later in order to prevent any loss being washed overboard the conclusion was that, except on the wind, and it was not till the night was dark that any of them were permitted to appear on deck.

As the ship rolled helplessly on the blue, it seemed like imprisonment for their own souls to confine themselves, but there were not many who were in condition to avail themselves of the permission to visit the deck.

Thus proportion of them were not strong enough to make any effort, and had little more to say because of them. As a last sign of severe sickness several had died, and in this way had to die, they were the last to die.

There was extremely perilous for the crew not afflicted with the sick to take a single step either down below. It was necessary for the captain to hold on with all his might and being dashed to pieces while partitions and furniture, they remained articles was hoisted from here and there, and it was some time to remain at any given point account of these violent movements, but the crew, wrenched by their bodies.

*Signs in The Argosy of last week.

Among the cabin passengers who had gathered in the saloon, though not half the number on board, there appeared to be nothing like an abandonment to despair, though the terrible cry that the ship was going to the bottom had reached their ears.

As the steamer did not go down there was hope among them, and most of them were encouraged by the assurances of the officers that there was no immediate danger. Perhaps it was hoping against hope, but there was a great deal of quiet courage displayed by the women as well as the men.

Perry remained on deck only long enough to learn the situation of the vessel. He was endowed with more than the average share of moral as well as physical courage, and he thought only of his mother in this hour of peril.

NOTHING ABOUT THE AFFAIRS OF THE GARDNER FAMILY.

MRS. GARDNER was the widow of a very wealthy New Yorker. Basil Gardner, her deceased husband, had a fortune of over a million, so well invested that at the time of his death it yielded an income of something over thirty thousand dollars.

At the age of twenty-five he had married, and his son

Roger had been born a year later. But when he was forty his first wife died, the son being fourteen at the time. Two years after he became a widower he married Grace Widdoughby, who was regarded as the most beautiful and accomplished young woman in the circle in which she moved.

Another son was born to him the next year, whom the mother named Percival after her own father. A dozen years later, the husband and father died of apoplexy at the

CHAPTER XI.

A FORMER FRIEND OF THE FAMILY.

It is necessary to give in detail the particulars of the transfer of all on board of the Elaineur to the Minnesota. It was not a small or an easy matter to accomplish, and the captain and ship's company of the young cutter covered themselves with glory in the exercise of their skill and bravery.

It rained a heavy sea on which the two steamers floated. The work of the boats was difficult and dangerous. In the first boats the party of four, whose conversation was given, were transported to the Minnesota, where they were heartily welcomed by her noble captain.

The Danish captain had caused the baggage of the passenger to be brought on deck, so he saved it, possibly, after the people on board had been rescued. The boats belonging to both ships were employed in the transfer, which was accomplished without the loss of a single life.

After the passengers were all safe, the baggage was taken on board, for much of it was necessary for the relief of the saved.

In the boats and sides of the poor young passengers were brought off; but the Danish boat left it was evident that the Elaineur must go in a short time.

The Minnesota and her crew and the Elaineur had not returned before the Elaineur steamer appeared from the sea of those who were saving her. The English steamer was half a day in methods most superior in the request. But the Minnesota in the end her noble captain had become a sort of a vast side of his fellow-men.

The addition of nearly five hundred persons to the number already on board of the steamer was embarrassing to the captain. It was evident that he could not reach any port in Europe or America unless at the expense of a great deal of suffering on the part of those crowded into the vessel.

The supply of provisions on board was not sufficient for such a multitude, and the crowded condition of the ship might prove fatal to many in case she should be beset by a violent storm. The captain decided very promptly to run for Fayal, in the Azores, which was the nearest land.

"Now, ladies and gentlemen, I am sorry I am not in a larger ship for your sakes," he said, coming into the cabin after he had given out the course of the ship. "I think I can give staterooms to the ladies, but the gentlemen must bunk on the cabin floor."

"We are entirely satisfied, whatever you do with us, captain; and we all wish your ship was as big as your heart," replied Mr. Rosenbahl.

This remark was followed by hearty applause on the part

Guy shook the colonel's outstretched hand, and, mounting his horse, galloped at a furious pace down the slope, followed at a little distance by Terril, who had overheard Guy's orders and was determined to accompany him.

As he came in sight of the river the scene that met his eyes was startling enough. At the foot of the pine-crowned bluff on the other shore were scores of dacoits, apparently well armed. They were hurriedly constructing a rude raft of teak logs, and Guy instantly perceived their object. They were going to take possession of the rock.

From the deck of the steamer Carey and his twenty men were popping away at them, but with little success.

THE CONVOY OF RUBIES.

By CAPTAIN CHARLES M. KEMP.

It was a great relief to me, after being shifted all over Burma, from Mandalay to the Shan Hills, to find myself comfortably fixed at last in the ruby mine district.

Colonel Parre was in charge of the mines, and our little camp was situated up on the slope of the Western Shan, a most entrancing view could at all times be had, from the village of Mogoke itself, the wide valley fringed with pink lotus blossoms and wild roses, dotted with mining camps and the white tents of the British soldiery, and dazzlingly brilliant when the sun shone on the golden domed temples and pagodas that stand to commemorate the virtues of deceased Chinese misers.

Ah! the wealth that flows into England's coffers from that little Burmese valley. Never did fortunes of war yield a richer prize to a conquering nation.

I was sitting on the veranda one afternoon, industriously rubbing away at a pair of revolvers, for on the following morning I was to undertake the most important commission that can be assigned to an officer in Burma.

The vast store of rubies that had been accumulating for months under British supervision was to be removed to the treasure house at Mandalay, and I was to escort this most valuable convoy to the Imperial City.

HUGH LEFT THE SADDLE VERY SUDDENLY, TURNING A COMPLETE SUMMERSACKY.

CHAPTER I.

THE FIRST ADVENTURE.

On a certain spring morning of last year, Harvey Sanders and Sydney Howard met on Washington Square in New York City, and each was eager to tell the other what was evidently considered an important piece of news.

Harvey began by saying :

"I've just had a letter from——"

Sydney concluded the remark by adding :

"From Hugh Weaver."

"He did you know?"

"Yes what?"

"That I'd just heard from Hugh?"

"I didn't say you had. I received a letter from him this morning, and here it is."

"I've got one too," and Harvey took from his pocket an envelope bearing the Philadelphia postmark, which was the exact counterpart of the missive held by his friend.

"I'll guarantee they contain the same proposition," and Sydney drew from its covering a sheet of paper on which was written the following :

DEAR SYD — My three months' vacation begins next week, and I am to do nothing but enjoy myself on a new Victor which father gave me yesterday. Why can't you and Harvey take a tour with me through Maine? I have an uncle living at Bryant's Pond, which is near the RELAUNDED.

AFTER Syd left them Hugh and Harvey first cured for their machines, and then strolled up and down the principal street of the town until it was time for dinner when they went to the hotel, wondering not a little why a companion failed to return.

"He is too angry even to eat," Harvey said laughingly; "a hot ride up will restore both appetite and temper, say."

"Not likely he will get a lunch at some farm house, and will be foolish for us to wait for him."

Either or no the detective had broken his promise relative to the fact that their knowledge of the daring robbers was kept a secret, the boys were unable to say; but it was certain that the guests at the hotel knew the wheelmen brought some information relative to the crime. When entered the house a number of men pined them with questions, and even while in the dining room were they detained for information.

But Hugh tried to evade his tormentors by making evasive replies; but after a time it became necessary to say positively that nothing could be told.

"We know very little at the best," Hugh said, just a trifle petulantly; "but we are not allowed to repeat it, and you must go to the chief of police for the particulars."

Decided as was this reply it did not suffice, and when the meal had been concluded the boys went to their room for relief from the throng of curious ones.

Here the time passed wearily, and at about three o'clock Harvey said in a tone of desperation:

"I can't stand this much longer. The idea of coming out for a tour and spending the entire day cooped up like rats in a cage! Besides, it is high time Syd was back. He may have met with an accident, and I believe we ought to hunt him up."

"I don't understand how that can be done. If both of us leave, the detective will think we are trying to run away,

A BLOODLESS VICTORY.

URING fully five minutes the two parties faced each other in silence, and then, after the elder of the men had held a short, whispered conversation with his companion, the boat was poled in to the shore, the thieves landing in a sulkily manner which, to the men, was decidedly gratifying.

"Don't let go the guns," he said in a low tone. "Those men are ready for any kind of mischief, and at the first advance we shall find ourselves in a hole."

"I'll watch them while you load the stuff into the boat," replied, and Syd and Harvey went to work with a swiftness to the general expectations, the men offered no more. They did not indulge in any further threats or promises, but went to their hut, remaining there hidden until the Ramblers' Club had made all the preparations for departure.

"They are hatching some kind of mischief," Syd said, when the goods were in the boat, and Hugh stood guard until his companions had taken their places on shore.

"Your mind them so long as no attempt is made to prevent leaving," Harvey replied impatiently. "The most important thing is to get away without loss of time. We've got a good deal of work to do between now and sunset."

"I'm in," Hugh urged, and two minutes later the wheelers were about once more.

"I wouldn't be much of a job for us to row up the lake a ways, cross over, and then strike out for Andover without those thieves being any the wiser," Syd said, when the boat was some distance from the shore, and the men yet remained in the seclusion of their camp.

"Do you mean by that suggestion to turn detective again?" Hugh asked, with a quizzical smile.

"There's bound to be a reward offered for the recovery of the goods. The thieves can't get away now they've turned the skiff adrift, and it would only be necessary for us to tell the authorities, after which we might go about our business."

"Were we allowed to do that at Lewiston? Then we simply proposed to repeat what had been heard, and to leave the town without delay; but you know the result. In this case, if we told all we know, judging by former experience, the club would be held prisoners during the remainder of the season."

"Don't let us talk so much about it," Harvey said impatiently. "I came out on a pleasure trip, which, thus far, has been a dismal failure, owing entirely to ourselves. From

SUSPENSE.

SYD'S one thought was to slip the cartridges in the barrels before the men could reach him; but in this he was unsuccessful, owing to the fact that his eagerness made him outward. On almost any other occasion he could have done it readily; at now, before the breach was closed, one of the men stood by his side.

"What are you fingerin' at that thing for?" was the gruff question, as, with a sudden blow, the paper was dashed from the boy's hands.

Until now Syd's courage had been very far from a sticking point, but "THE SHALL BE MADE TO SUFFER FOR THIS!" CRIED SYD.

The summary proceeding aroused his anger, and, without thought of the possible consequences, he replied:

"To protect our property from such as you. Where did you get the boat?"

"I borrowed her, that's all," and the man laughed as if saying he had said something very witty.

"I'll have you arrested for stealing."

* See Vol. IX, No. 21 of THE ARGOSY.

"So you shall, my little dear, when you get the chance; but just now it's a case of contentin' yourself with promises. We've come to beg a little grub, an'—hello! It looks as if we stood a good show of gettin' all we wanted. Here, Barney, help me stow our share of this meat into the boat."

The man thus referred to was the one who had remained out of sight during Syd's visit to the house in the woods—he who had connected caution when the two arrived at the cove. Now he seemed to have no scruples about stealing the provisions, and at once began to carry his companion's order into execution.

As for Syd, he was powerless. The younger thief calmly lifted the gun from the ground, placed it in the boat despite its owner's angry remonstrances, and then assisted his partner in loading the craft.

"You shall be made to suffer for this!" the boy cried. "I will notify the authorities at Anshover!"

"That's the only thing you can do," the younger man replied mockingly; "but it'll be necessary to get there, an' you won't find the walkin' very good. Me an' Barney tried to ride straight on to the teeth of the advancing foe, but they knew that they might rely upon Mori's word, so they acted as he advised. The horses soon became aware of their danger, for, when they had crossed the next low ridge, after an hour's rapid riding along a fairly level stretch of scrub covered country, the line of leaping flames could be seen, stretching as far as the eye could see to the north and south. The quivering lips of the beasts, their dilated nostrils and wildly starting eyes, showed how greatly they feared the dreaded element.

Now it was that they began to pass numbers of animals, all hurrying and rushing along in object terror in the opposite direction to the horsemen.

Kangaroos and wallabies progressing by great leaps; emus flapping their irreflexed wings to help them in their flight; bush rats and smaller creatures scuttling along by the side of wriggling snakes and curish dingoes.

Overhead were flocks of parrots, pigeons, cockatoos, and other bush birds, all flying away from the great cloud of rolling smoke and flame that seemed to stride with enormous steps after the frightened creatures.

For the time all enemies between them seemed forgotten; kangaroos and dingoes, snakes and rats and opossums rushed along side by side in the friendliness of a great common danger.

Every moment as the three hurried on, the heat became

CHAPTER I.

THEN AND NOW.

Five o'clock, the busiest hour of the day in Fox & Gold's restaurant. On each side of the long lunch counter, and at two smaller counters running down the sides, men were perched on stools, running, eating, drinking—no other terms will express the present-day meal hour as if they were loading a gun upon which might at any moment take to flight.

"Hammersley! Is it really you?"

A young fellow in a cape overcoat, who was crossing towards a vacant stool of which he had just caught hold abruptly as though a live electric wire had snaked across his path. He held out his hand to a man of his own age, who had acted as the live wire, and an employee of the restaurant.

Two waiters were occupied in removing the dishes

"Arlington!" he exclaimed in a low voice, and managed to set the dishes safely down on the counter again and take his friend's hand.

Then, speaking to a colored waiter who came up, he said: "Pumpkin pie for this gentleman," and turned once more to his friend.

"Great Scott, Hammersley, what under the sun are you doing here?"

GUY HAMMERSLEY; HIS FRIENDS AND HIS ADVENTURES.

By MATTHEW WHITE, JR.

"VERRA MUCH OBLIGED TO YOU, SIR, FOR LETTING ME KNOW," MR. TREUTHAMM WAS SAYING.

CHAPTER V.

IN THE BOOK STORE.

WHEN Guy re-entered Mr. Inwood's room, he found Mr. Fox and Mr. Trethar with their chairs drawn up close to that of the advertising manager. Evidently their heads had been together in most serious discussion. "Young man," began Mr. Inwood, "we have come to a decision, and one, I am bound to say, which your obstinacy is in the least merit. It is this: in consideration of Trethar's feelings and those of Mr. Berdell, I will not hold charge. Mr. Fox will replace the thirteen dollars and dismiss you from his employ. The case will not be brought into the courts, and we will do our best to keep it out of the newspapers. As I said before, you do not deserve this clemency, and if you have a spark of gratitude in your heart, it ought to send you down upon your knees before Mr. Fox to thank him for his consideration."

Gratitude! The word seemed a mockery to Guy, used in this connection. He was to be sent off, unscrupulously, branded with the suspicion of having committed a theft, and was expected to be grateful!

He could not speak, he felt a choking sensation in his throat, while not the color of shame, but the paler of hope-

CHAPTER I.

TOM TURNER'S MISHAP.

"I WISH I hadn't played ball this afternoon," soliloquized Tom Turner, as he eyed ruefully a large rent in the knee of his only pair of trousers. "It isn't as if I had half a dozen sets like Clarence Kent. His father would buy him a new pair every month if he wanted them, while I think myself lucky to get a pair once a year."

This was the way it happened. The ball had been batted over the fence by Alfred Hudson, who was a powerful batter, and a cry went up "Lost ball!" The game was suspended while Tom Turner, who was one of the fielders, jumped over the fence and recovered it. Tom was a good gymnast, and undertook to vault the fence on his return. How in some about he could not explain, but he failed to accomplish the feat satisfactorily, and managed to tear an ugly rent in the knee of his pantaloons. He bruised the knee itself a little also, but this he did not mind so much. The injury to his

READING THE WILL.

IT may easily be imagined that Mr. Benson's announcement was listened to by the expectant heirs with earnest attention.

The will was evidently written by a lawyer, and began with the usual formal phrases. The first item of interest was as follows:

"My house, in which I have lived for forty years, I leave with the lot attached, to my nieces, daughters of my brother Reuben, who I have reason to think are saving girls, and will not squander what I give them. As they are past the age when they can expect to get married" (the three sisters looked at each other with great indignation when this passage was read) "they may find it for their advantage to move into the house, as it will save them rent. As the place is somewhat out of repair I leave them a hundred dollars to defray the expenses of renovation."

The three nieces looked far from happy, or gratified. They had expected much more. Probably the value of the house and lot at a liberal estimate would not exceed two hundred and fifty dollars, which with the hundred dollars added would make three hundred and fifty only.

Hector Pendergast could not wholly conceal his amusement at the discomfiture of his cousins.

"Poor old girls!" he whispered to Tom, "that's rather a hard hit at them—about being past the marrying age, I mean. I give them joy of their bequest."

This was the next item.

"My nephew Hector Pendergast will probably expect to

WHAT THE ENVELOPE CONTAINED.

THE envelope contained five ten dollar bills, and these few lines on a half sheet of note paper:

MY YOUNG FRIEND:—You have done a great service to my daughter and little son, in saving them from a possible upset. Accept the fifty dollars inclosed, not as compensation, but as a slight mark of my friendly regard.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES SCOTT.

"Look at that, mother!" exclaimed Tom, joyfully.

"How much is it, Tom?"

"Fifty dollars."

Mrs. Turner's face reflected Tom's joy.

"Truly this is a happy day for us," said his mother.

"Now we shall be able to meet the interest on the mortgage."

"When does it come due?"

"Today."

"I had forgotten all about it."

"Squire Kent won't be likely to forget it."

"No, he is always sharp on money matters. By gracious, there he comes! I will go to the door."

Squire Kent was a tall, thin man with a long Roman nose. He owned three houses in the village which were rented out. He was very punctilious in exacting his rent when it was due, and never allowed sickness to be an excuse for delay.

"Is your mother at home, Thomas?" he asked.

THE MYSTIC MINE; OR, STRANGE ADVENTURES IN MEXICO AND ARIZONA. BY WILL LISENBEE.

"IT'S ABOUT THIS NUGGET THAT I WISH TO SPEAK TO YOU."

CHAPTER I. AT YUMA.

"AND so we shall be ready to leave here by day after tomorrow, you think?"

"Yes, I hope so, at least, for I am growing sick of this lake oven atmosphere."

"So am I, Harry; but in view of the success which we have had, I am not disposed to grumble at the weather."

"You are right," was the answer, "but I shall feel more thankful after we are away from this disagreeable old town."

The two boys carrying on the above conversation were strolling leisurely down one of the narrow, crooked streets of Yuma, Arizona. They were two fine specimens of American health and vigor.

Harry Benedict, the older of the two, was seventeen, tall and handsome, with bright, intelligent blue eyes, broad

LIKE A FLASH THE LEOPARD SPRANG UP AND ENVELOPED HIS VICTIM IN THE MAN'S RECK.

PROLOGUE.

IT was November in London. The great city was buried under a dank, yellow fog. Traffic was temporarily checked: foot passengers groped their way by the light of the street lamps, and the hoarse shouts of the lack boys running before cabs and carriages with blinding torches rang at intervals above the muffled rumble of countless wheels.

In the coffee room of a quiet hotel on the Strand a young man stands by the window, looking pensively out on the misty street. He is quite young, with light hair that falls half over his forehead, and a drooping, golden moustache, and in rather startling contrast to these a deep bronzed complexion that tells of foreign lands and tropical suns.

"Captain Chutney, sir?"

It is a hotel servant, with a big blue envelope in his hand, and, as the young man wheels round, he reveals the uniform and bright facings of a captain of Hussars.

He led the march, that drummer boy,
As bold as man could be,
Through forests where the foe's decoy
Lurked behind every tree.

Through ambuscades and ice and snow,
And up the mountain height
Where even eagles feared to go,
He led them with delight.

And through the streets of old Quebec
He led them to the fray,
As brave as Nelson on his deck
In famed Trafalgar bay.

And there by good Montgomery's side,
The Continental's joy,
He met the volley, fell and died,
The Yankee drummer boy.

CHAPTER V.

THE NIGHT ON THE ROOF.

THE tragic scene described at the close of the preceding chapter, following on the very heels of the outbreak, was a fearful shock to all who saw it, and for an instant they could only stare at each other with mute, frightened faces.

Colonel Carrington broke the spell. With drawn sword he made a dash for the door, closely followed by the rest, but before they could cross the apartment a leader burst of firing came from the very courtyard, bullets whistled through the windows, and then a scuffle broke out in the hall, and angry voices were heard. It was over in a moment; a cry of pain, a low groan, followed by the sound of bars dropped in their sockets, and then into the room burst three Hindoo soldiers, grimy with blood and powder.

"Sahib colonel," cried the foremost, "we are lost. The Arabs and Senegals have revolted. Hundreds of them surround the residency. Yonder in the hall lies a dead Senegal. We have barred the doors, but they will soon be in."

Even as he spoke, the portals shook under a succession of thunderous blows.

"The rear door," cried the colonel. "We may escape that way."

"No, no; the building is surrounded," rejoined the Hindoo. "There is no escape."

He was right. Shots were heard on all sides, the blows on the doors redoubled, and stray shots came in at the windows, both front and rear.

Sir Arthur lay prostrate in his chair.

"The roof! the roof!" he groaned. "We must take to the roof."

"By Jove, he's right," cried the colonel. "It's our last hope. Blow out the lights and come on, quick!"

THE CRIMSON BANNER; THE TROPHY OF THE BERKSHIRE LEAGUE. BY WILLIAM D. MOFFAT.

THROUGH THE DEEPENING TWILIGHT I MANAGED TO RECOGNIZE TWO OF MY CLASSMATES.

CHAPTER I.

A SINGULAR LETTER.

ON a pleasant evening during the first week in April I left my room in Colver Hall and started across the campus of Belmont College toward the main street of the town. As I approached the gateway at the entrance to the grounds, I saw several students sitting upon and around the two large cannons that stood on either side of the gateway, mounted upon their old-fashioned iron carriages.

These old cannons were landmarks of the college, and dear to the heart of every student. Many years before they had been discovered by a rambling party of students in a deserted part of the hilly country about ten miles west of Belmont. It was believed that they had been left there by a section of the army during the war of 1861. However that might be, they were appropriated and dragged home to the college, where they were enthusiastically adopted by the students, and soon became favorite lounging posts for leisure moments. Almost every warm afternoon or evening would find several students perched on the old artillery and seated upon the grass near by, reading, chatting, or singing college songs.

Through the deepening twilight I managed to recognize two of my classmates leaning against one of the cannons.

"Hello, Miller," I called out, "where is Tony Larson?"

"Down by the lake, I think," was the answer. "He was here about twenty minutes ago, and said he was going to the boat house to look after his canoe."

THE TREASURE OF SOUTHLAKE FARM.

BY BERT FOSTER.

PROLOGUE.

SOME three miles outside of a little village in central New England lay Southlake Farm, its green pastures, noble woodlands and rocky slopes covering a tract of four hundred acres. The farm completely surrounded South Lake, a sheet of half a mile in length and half as broad. South Lake opened through a narrow passage into Benton Pond, and the farm was bounded for some distance both west and east of this passage by the latter body of water.

The unsullied part of Southlake (and it was by far the greater portion) contained some of the finest scenery in New England. The wooded hollows, rugged slopes, and beautiful lake shore, would have delighted an artist; but the farmers throughout had but an indifferent opinion of Southlake. Their artistic education had been neglected, and in the mossy gray boulders and rocky ravines and hillsides they saw only that which spoiled the farm for agricultural purposes. In their eyes the woodland was its only redeeming feature, and to them the timber would cost almost as much as it was worth. What under the sun could have been John McClure's object in buying this wilderness was more than the country folks could imagine.

Twenty years before the time of which I write, John McClure and his brother James, both natives of Scotland, came to Southlake. John's money bought the place, and John's wife set about making the old farmhouse homelike for her husband and his bachelor brother. She was a pretty, cheerful little woman, with unbounded faith in her husband's wisdom in selecting this rocky barrenland instead of the many fertile ones about there. John McClure said that he was used to boulders, and that the rocky pastures seemed more like dear old Scotland than most of the farms he had seen in America. James said nothing. It was more by his advice than ought else that his brother had purchased the place, and in requesting John to buy it he had an object.

JAMES MCCLURE TOOK THE ROAD TO THE VILLAGE.

CHAPTER III.

A FRIEND IN NEED.

SANDY McCLURE was certainly in danger, but I doubt if he fully realized it. He thought the man was simply trying to intimidate him, but had he known something of the fellow's past history he might have been more seriously alarmed. As it was, he felt faint and thoroughly frightened for a moment, for he knew that if the piece should happen to go off he could not possibly escape a charge of shot.

But very unexpected rescue was at hand. The howling piece was suddenly seized from behind and wrenched out of the rough's hands, and he was confronted by a tall, wiry young fellow who was "covering" him in the same manner he had a moment before "covered" Sandy. The new comer approached so silently that he was not noticed.

"Don't shoot!" cried the man, dodging behind a tree whose trunk was far too small to protect him. "Don't point that gun this way like that—it might go off."

"Steady, my hearty," was the response, in a rather melodious voice. "Don't get scared. This isn't the wild, wild West, though to judge from your actions a few moments ago one would think it was. Now suppose you take this young gentleman's advice and stand not upon the order of your going, but go at once."

"Hold on a moment," continued the cool individual as the vanquished rough willyingly clambered into the boat, followed by his two companions.

Sandy's unknown champion discharged the weapon in the air, and then rapped the lock smartly on a bowlder.

"There," he said, handing back the gun. "I think that I have given the gunsmith a job before that can be used to any purpose. Now oblige this young gentleman by moving, and keep right on until you are outside the limits of this farm."

"YOU'VE GOT TO PROMISE THAT YOU'LL NEVER REVEAL A WORD OF WHAT I TELL YOU."

As the boat disappeared Sandy's rescuer turned with a smile toward him.

"I should say these boys were in very bad company," he said. "That fellow is mean enough for almost anything that doesn't require much courage. His natural cowardice alone keeps him from being a villain."

While he was speaking Sandy looked him over carefully. He had the appearance of a man of twenty-five or six. A two weeks' growth of beard did much to mar his natural good looks. His dress was a baggy, ragged sack suit, once black, but now a rusty brown, a pair of worn-out shoes

CHAPTER XXI.

A PERIOD OF SUFFERING.

WHEN Jack Ashton and Eben Sanford, with their two companions, the frontiersman and the Pioneer scout, reached the edge of the forest above the Sanford ranch, they came in sight of that homestead for the first time on their journey. All of them, especially Eben, were glad to get a view of it, and to ascertain whether the buildings were all standing or had been destroyed by the raiders, as Eben feared.

The sight that met the boy's eyes was a somewhat puzzling one to him. The ranch house was there, but the out buildings had disappeared, and their site was marked by a faint column of smoke that still rose from the smoldering embers. The Indians must have been there, but why they should have destroyed one part of the homestead and spared the rest, Eben could not understand. And had the raiders been beaten off, or had they succeeded in storming the ranch and massacring the inmates? A moment later, with a thrill of the most intense relief, Eben concluded that this dreadful alternative had not happened, for he caught sight of figures moving about the buildings, which even at that distance he felt sure were those of white men, not Indians.

But before Eben could speculate further, there fell upon his ears a startling and unexpected sound. It was the sound of rifle firing, so deafened by

A HEART OF GOLD.

CHAPTER XV.

RESPONSE.

AN hour or so after Ned left him, Sport hung halfway up the rigging, staring out at the northeast, where a faint gleam brightened the universal work of the sky. The sea was light enough—too light—it flickered and waned with every lift of the waves, like a burning floor.

The passengers were all gathered in the saloon, with the companion doors shut; the vessel was given up to her crew, and something was coming out of that faint light in the northeast, which set experienced seamen's hearts beating thickly, and for the first time caused Sport a pang of regret that he had allowed anything to cut him off from instant access to Ned and Nellie. Things would have to be very bad indeed before an ordinary seaman would be allowed to mingle with the passengers in the saloon, in search of those he longed to help. Why had he not stuck by "little missy" through thick and thin, till he had seen her safe in her uncle's care?

"But I'll be on hand when wanted, discipline or no discipline," muttered he, studying the dull, foggy way in which the steamer tumbled up the heaping activities, and fell, instead of plunged, down the other side, into the trough.

Depending on her machinery, all the sails she could mount were not sufficient to bear along her mighty bulk and weight so lightly enough for such a sea, and her sluggishness rendered her dull about answering her helm.

"I never signed articles aboard the Southern Queen," Sport went on ruminating; "I've done my duty by 'em, above an'

CHAPTER I. THE FUGITIVE.

THE fast schooner, Southern Belle, was winding her way among the beautiful islands of the Virgin Group, and Richard Allen, the son of her owner, leaned against the bulwarks, gazing in admiration at the gorgeous tropical scenery.

"A signal from the shore, captain!" he suddenly exclaimed, turning to the weather-beaten salt at his side. The latter had been pointing out places of interest, while scanning the beach attentively, as if looking for some particular spot.

"Where?" inquired Captain Bill eagerly.

"There is a gentleman and young lady standing on the sand, waving their handkerchiefs to us," replied Richard, pointing to a small island fringed with a dazzling white beach, about a quarter of a mile ahead of them.

"What eyes you've got, to be sure!" said Captain Bill admiringly, turning his glass in the direction of the beach. "Yes, that's the party," he continued in a tone of satisfaction, after a careful scrutiny.

THE STEAMER SIGNALLED THE SCHOONER TO LAY TO.

"What party, captain?" asked Richard.

"Don't you remember your father told us we were to take a passenger on board, if signaled to do so, when passing the Virgin Group?"

"Yes! Señor Iglesias—a Cuban patriot—the best of his old customers."

"Many is the invoice this very craft has taken to him from your father," continued Captain Bill. "He is a splendid fellow, and will give you lots of good business hints. The way that fellow understands the market in sugar and molasses is a caution. I must take in sail and send a boat off for him."

CHAPTER V. FRIENDLY SHELTER.

RICHARD no longer heard the voices of the men around him. He retained his despairing grip around Sylvia's form with one hand, and clung tenaciously to the life line with the other. He felt that some boarding of light, coming from a hut made of bamboo and palm leaves, standing on the skirt of the woods behind them. She rose, cast an anxious glance at Richard's upturned face, then hastened toward the hut and knocked upon the frail door.

It was immediately opened by a burly black man, who swung a lantern in his hand.

"Who's dar?" he inquired, letting the rays of his light fall on Sylvia's wan face. "Well, 'fore de Lord! How come you here dis time o' night, missy?"

was under him, but despair crept into his heart, and he was about to give up when he experienced a jarring sensation, as if the raft had collided with some fixed object, and then he discerned faintly a stretch of yellow sand and behind that trees and hills.

"Land! land!" he shouted wildly, and with one herculean effort he flung Sylvia on his shoulder, staggered through the surf, and fell unconscious, barely out of reach of the angry waters.

Sylvia, who had undergone the least fatigue, first recovered consciousness. Thrilled with the recollection of the preceding hours, she was at first unable to render any aid to Richard, whose prostrate form she saw dimly in the moonlight, for the storm had passed away as suddenly as it had arisen, and though the waves dashed against the sands and washed up to within a dozen yards of the spot where he lay, the sky was cloudless and the wind had subsided.

Sylvia looked around, and a glad cry escaped her as she perceived a glimmer

CHAPTER VIII.

BATTLE OF THE WATER HORSE.

THE pursuit of the Trampers was now renewed, and after they had crested down the mountain side a while, a break in the forest exposed the pass at a lower point in the road, running parallel to that on which they stood. The pass was a ravine which crossed the road and was spanned by a little bridge. Under this tumbled a cascade of clear water, fed by numberless springs and never falls higher up the mountain. The ten Cavaliers, under Tom Shields, could be seen crouching among the rocks on which the bridge rested, ready to hurl their fearful water bombs upon the unsuspecting enemy, who were just turning the last wind of the road before reaching the pass.

At the head of the Trampers stalked the German

CHAPTER I.

ROBERT MARSTON'S DISAPPOINTMENT.

IT was a crisp, sunny morning in early autumn, just the weather for walking. There had been a shower during the night, so there was no dust, and the rain had not been heavy enough to make mud. Birds sang in the trees, a rippling brook ran merrily alongside the road and all around was a picturesque vision of rolling meadow and upland, backed in the distance by the blue haze of a range of hills.

There was but one person in sight to enjoy all this, and he seemed to be doing anything else but that. He was a tallish lad of seventeen or perhaps more, with broad shoulders and well knit figure. His face a power by just at present could not see, as he walked along with head bent toward the ground, although not in the eager, expectant attitude of one who is hoping to find something with every step taken in advance.

"Hello, Bob! Can't you look up and nod to a fellow?" A boy's voice broke the silence, coming from the front door yard of a farmhouse close in the road which the other was just passing. The owner of the voice, a freckle faced lad of sixteen, wearing a broad brimmed straw hat, a blue checked shirt and well patched trousers, dropped his rake and came out to the fence to shake hands with his friend.

"Why, what is the matter with you, Bob?" he asked. "You look clean tickled out or something."

"Yes, George, it's something with a big S," and Bob Marston dropped down on the grass by the roadside and pulling up a blade began to draw it savagely back and forth between his teeth. "I've been over to Griggsville. You remember about Fielder, the flower man, promising me a place there this fall? Now he's just invented a type setting machine and is discharging some of his old help instead of taking on new ones."

"Well, you know I always said a prince in disguise oughtn't to soil his hands with printer's ink," laughed George Frazee, making a mock obeisance.

"Oh, come now, George, when are you going to give over that nonsense?" and the other looked half annoyed.

"Why should it be nonsense?" persisted George. "You know you're not own brother to Dick and Paul Marston, don't you?"

"Yes, and that's all I do know about it."

"Well, then, so long as you are not positively assured that you're not a prince, why may you not be that as well as anything else?"

"It certainly looks as if I was not going to be anything at all just at present," looks out Bob, the gloomy look coming back to his face.

"And I can't get something to do this fall. With the peach and apple crops both a failure, the place isn't going to bring us in much, and now since Dick's sold off the east corner to Dr. Train, he doesn't really need my help on the farm. And I'll go on tramp before I'll sit down at that table and not earn my salt."

WALTER SHERWOOD'S PROBATION.

BY HORATIO ALGER, JR.

CHAPTER XXIX.

WALTER MEETS A HORSE.

"YOU can look at the pistol as I hold it," said Walter, in response to the request recorded at the close of the preceding chapter.

"No offense, stranger? You are right to be keener with me, as you don't know me. I'm tired myself, though I'm ashamed to say it."

"I am not tired, but I prefer to keep my revolver in my own hands."

"Certain, stranger; you're right every time. I'd like a revolver like that, but I'm a poor man, and couldn't afford to buy it. How much would you have paid for it?"

"I got it second hand," said Walter briefly, "and the price would be no guide to you."

"I say," remarked the stranger suddenly, "don't you want to buy a horse?"

"Meaning the horse you are riding?" inquired Walter.

"Yes."

Walter looked at the animal, felt that he should indeed like to be the owner. He was fond of horses, and was a good rider. "How much do you ask for the horse?" he asked.

"I'll take a hundred dollars for him."

This was a low price for so fine an animal, and Walter said so.

"But," he continued, "it wouldn't pay me to buy him. If I were living at home it would be different."

"You are in a tight place," pleaded the horseman.

"I haven't got five dollars to my name, and I can't afford to keep the horse."

"That's bad!" said Walter, in a tone of sympathy.

"You see as long as I keep him I've got to board him as well as myself. I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll let you have him for seventy-five dollars. That's a bargain for you."

Walter shook his head.

"I don't care to invest seventy-five dollars in a horse," he said. "You'd better keep on to the nearest town, and you can get more for him."

"I might, but I want to get him off my hands. Come, I'll make you a final offer. Give me fifty dollars, and he's yours."

"But this would be robbing you," objected Walter.

"Not if I agree to it," returned the stranger. "You'll be doing me a favor, besides, for my old mother is sick, and I want to get to her as quick as I can."

Walter was very strongly tempted. He felt that fifty dollars would be a ridiculously low price for such a fine animal. He didn't like to take advantage of the necessities of the stranger, but, as the latter represented that the purchase would be a favor to him, his scruples seemed unnecessary.

"I will think you had better ride on to the next town and sell your horse for a better price," he felt constrained to say.

"That's my lookout," said the newcomer. "Ready money's what I need now."

"In that case I will give you the price you ask. But I shall want you to give me a bill of sale."

"I've got no paper nor ink."

"I have some paper and a fountain pen," said Walter.

"What's the odds? I give you the horse, and you give me the money."

"I would prefer to have a record of the sale. It won't take me a minute."

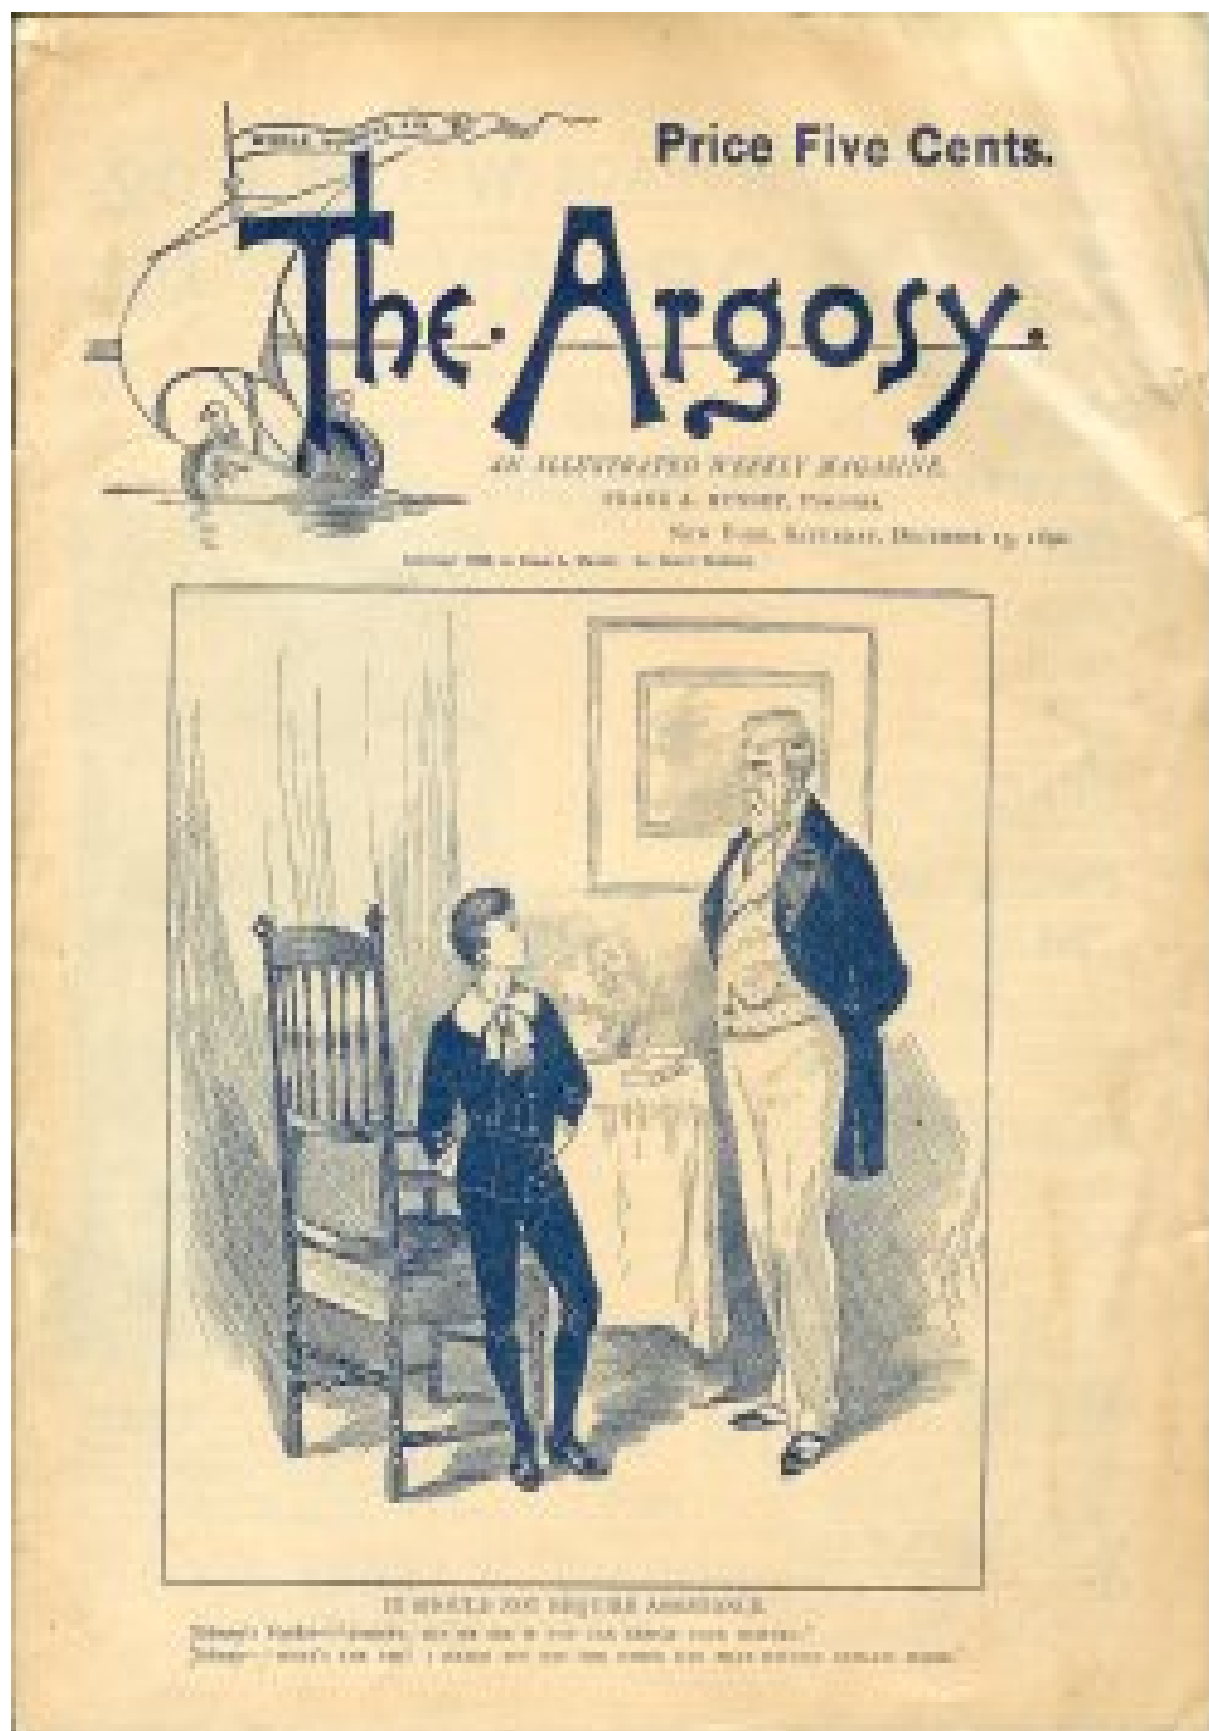

Walter had a pad in his satchel, and a fountain pen in his pocket. He hastily wrote out the following form:

In consideration of fifty dollars by me received, I give and transfer to Walter Sherwood my own horse (here followed a brief description of the animal).

"COME ALONG," SAID THE CONSTABLE, TAKING WALTER BY THE ARM.

THE PENROSE PLOT.

BY WILLIAM HERBERT CRAYTON.

CHAPTER I.

IN WHICH MAJOR PENROSE APPEARS ON THE SCENE.

THE narrow, dirty street was blocked with vehicles—cabs, merchandise drays, carts, and a sprinkling of private carriages. Beyond the jam, where the wharf ran to the water's edge, one could see the distant roofs and chimneys of Brooklyn, bits of open water, and the massive red capped funnels of the big ocean steamer that had just cast anchor at the landing.

All was confusion as the passengers came and over the gangplank and began to greet the expectant friends in waiting. Exclamations of joy and surprise were heard on all sides, the cab drivers shouted their hoarse yajpas, and the steam tug out on the river shrieked with sympathy. The custom-house officers alone preserved a calm demeanor, as they flung trunk lids or opened valises, or kept a watchful eye upon the hurried passengers around them.

Among the first to reach the pier was a middle-aged man, tall, darkly built, clad in a well-fitting suit of light brown, with a derby to match. His features—to a casual observer, at least—were pleasing and attractive. His face was slightly bronzed, his eyes were blue, and a heavy blond mustache—such as a London guardman might have envied—gave him an unmistakable military air. In his right hand was a box-shaped portmanteau of olive leather, plastered with foreign labels, conspicuous among which were Marseilles, Paris, Exton, and Liverpool.

This stranger might have been a returning American or a visiting Englishman. His actions, at least, showed a certain familiarity with his surroundings. No friends were waiting to meet him, and he seemed to expect none.

He pushed right through the jostling crowd, turning a deaf ear to the supplications of newsgals and hack drivers, and walked at a rapid pace up the squalid street until Broadway was reached.

"Eh, ben?" he exclaimed, pausing on the corner. "Et est l'Amérique encore et c'est New York?"

"Keh, eh, keh!" cried a sharp-eyed driver, as he drew his horses to the curb.

The stranger hesitated, and then tossed his bag through the doorway.

"Yes," he said in perfect English. "I say, my man, does the Graham Hotel still exist on Cortlandt Street?"

"Not this long while, sir," replied cabbie, with unalloyed surprise. "The house was torn down this ten years past."

"Ah, very well; take me to the Melton House, Union Square, then."

"A theatrical govt," murmured cabbie to himself, as he drove up Broadway, "an' one what knowed New York fifteen years ago, if I ain't mistaken."

Meanwhile, from the cab window his passenger watched the busy life surging around him with interest and curiosity until Union Square was reached, and the cab halted before the hotel door.

He paid and dismissed the driver, and walked up to the desk.

"Shall I show you to your room now?" asked the courteous clerk, as he touched a bell.

"No; but you can send my valise up;" and, seizing a pen, the newly arrived guest pulled the open register toward him, and wrote in a firm, rapid hand.

MAJOR HORACE PENROSE.

Then he paused, tapped his teeth reflectively with the end of the pen holder, and walked abruptly away without finishing the line.

He passed into the luxurious cafe beyond, and seated himself at a window looking on the square.

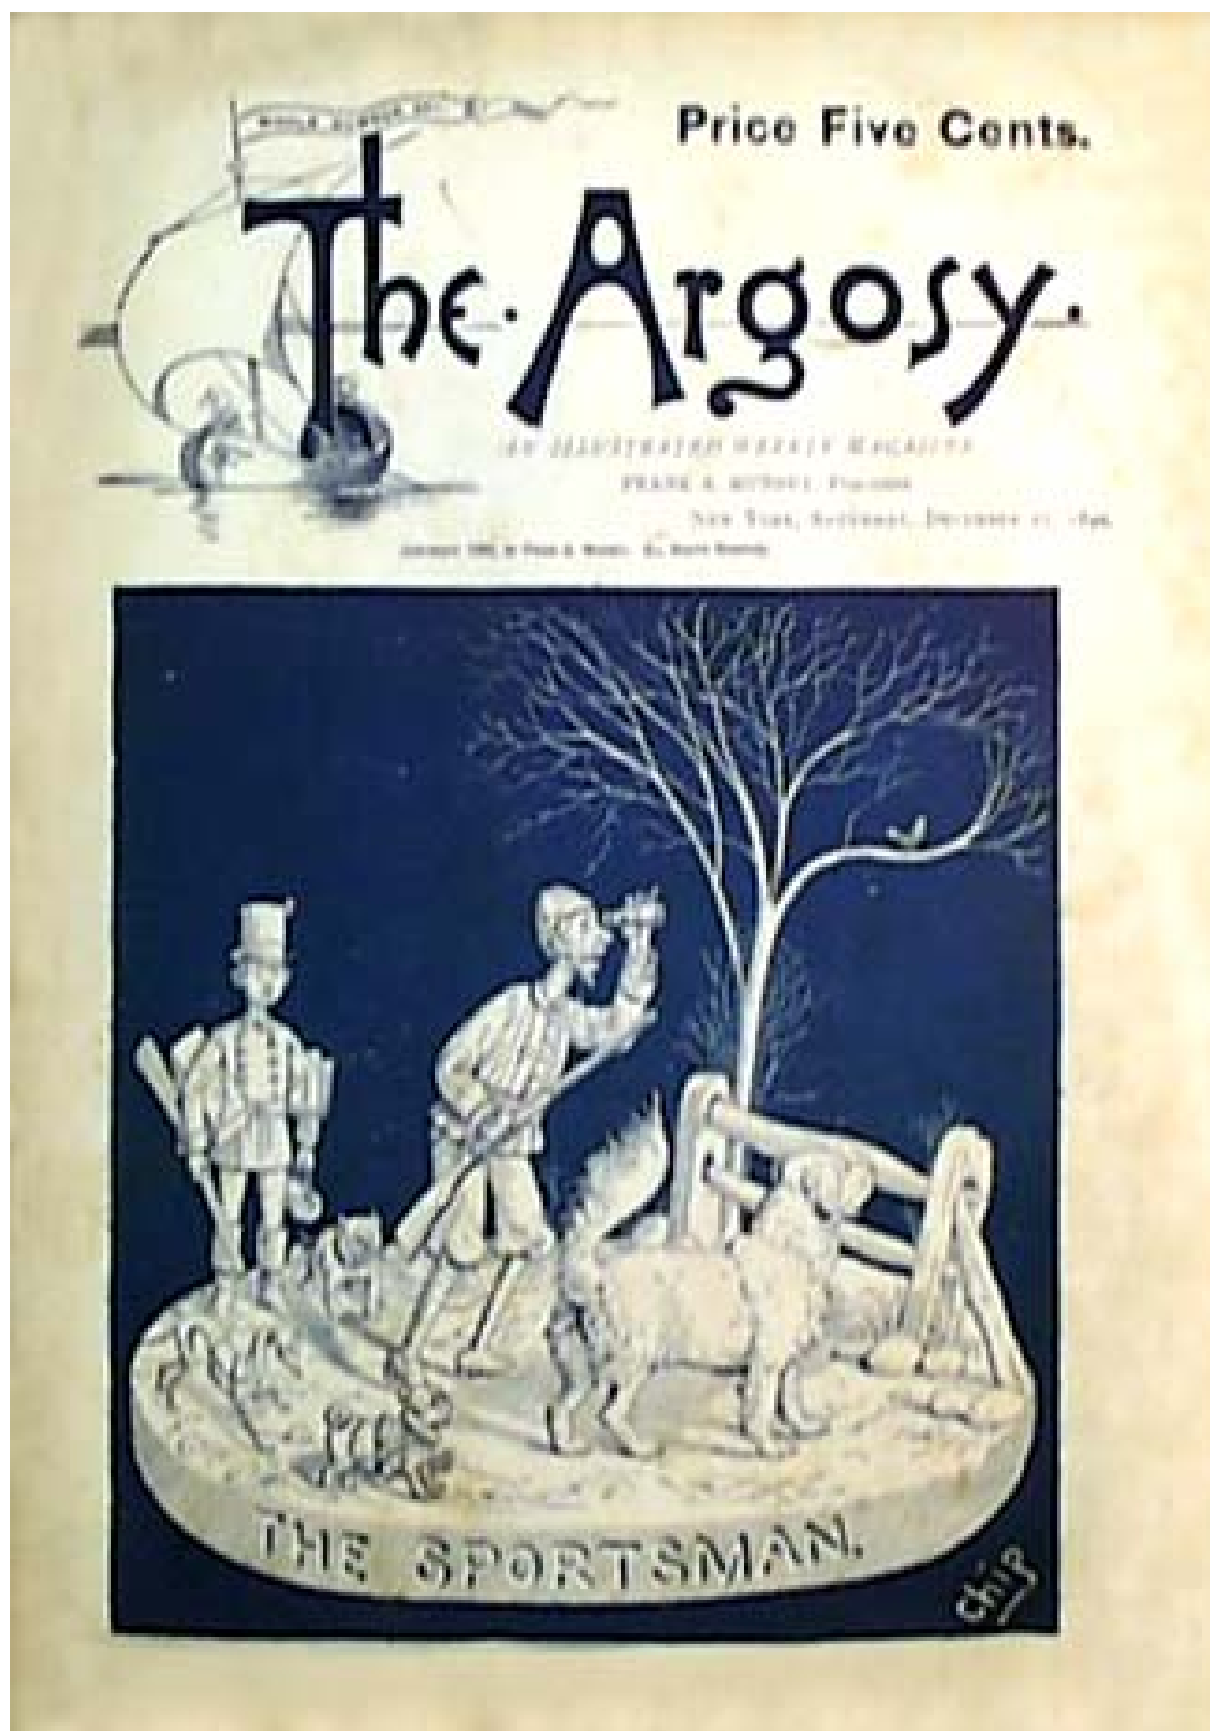

"Twelve pounds left," he muttered. "That ought to do me. I'd like to stay here a few days and look around, but it would be the better plan to go straight home, I suppose," and he laughed softly to himself.

"Waiter," he added briskly, "bring me some soup, roast lamb with

CHAPTER VII.

IN WHICH SOME STRANGE THINGS OCCUR.

DICK was stunned and dizzy from the shock of the wound, but staggered to his feet almost instantly. His first impulse was to stop his head to the side of his head, where he felt a stinging pain. Something was trickling down his neck, and when he looked at his hand it was wet with blood.

"There are two of the marks," was his first thought. "One behind and one in front."

He had sufficient presence of mind to stoop down and pick up the pistol which had fallen from his grasp. He saw the composed hunter advancing from the dam and tried to take aim, but before he could press the trigger a familiar voice called out:

"Did you there, don't shoot, it's me—Ford."

"What are you doing here?" exclaimed Dick in amazement as the Englishman advanced. "I took you for the burglar."

"Hush! that's just what I took you for," replied Ford. "Who fired that shot just now? Why, Mister Dick, you're wounded."

"I know I am," said Dick feebly. "Here, give me your arm, Ford."

He staggered slightly, but Ford caught him just in time and half-carried him to a hollow tree, close at hand.

Just then Miller and Jackson hurried to the spot and were joined a few seconds later by Major Penrose, clad in dressing gown and slippers.

"Have you got the burglar?" he demanded eagerly. "Why, here's this! You here, Ford! And what is the matter with Dick?"

"I'm shot," replied Dick feebly. "The man that did it is right back here in the woods. Don't let him get away."

"Run for the doctor," shouted the major in great concern. "You go, Miller, while Ford and Jackson hunt for the assassin; he can't be far off."

"No, he ain't far off," said Ford, darting a glance of deep significance at the major.

"Then search for him," cried the major fiercely. "Don't stand here like an idiot—hold on!"

A lantern was seen glimmering through the trees, and the next moment proved to be a neighboring farmer with two of his sons, who had been roused by the shooting. Pompey brought up the rear, breathless and excited. He broke into loud lamentations on learning that Dick was wounded, but the major angrily commanded him to be silent.

The newcomers, led by Ford, hurried away to hunt the woods for the burglar, and presently Miller returned past home from the village with Dr. Giden.

Dick by this time had fainted from loss of blood. The doctor made an examination, while the major held the lantern up.

"It was a tremendously close shave," he announced, "but not at all dangerous. The bullet has plowed through the skin just above the right ear."

"Ain't he quite ter did then?" asked Pompey jeeringly.

"Not just yet," answered the doctor. "He ought to be taken home at once though. He's had a good deal of blood."

"I'll fetch him of one end," said Pompey.

He took Dick tenderly by the shoulders, and Miller raising his feet, they moved slowly toward the house.

A general alarm had been given by this time, and many persons from Lewisberry were hurrying to the scene. The squire met the little proceeds on the porch. His fears were allayed by the doctor, who hastened to assure him that Dick was not badly injured.

"Thank God," exclaimed the squire fervently, "I heard the shooting and feared some disaster. That's the way with Dick, always headless of danger. Bring him right up to my room and put him on the lounge. Have they caught the assassin?"

CHAPTER XVI.

IN WHICH THE MAJOR GETS THE WILL.

THE major's threat had a crushing effect upon poor Frank.

"You would not dare," he cried. "It would ruin me."

He dropped into a chair and covered his face with his hands.

Then with tears in his eyes he begged and implored, but his entreaties were of no avail. The major was inexorable.

"There is no alternative," he said; "either do what I wish or exposure will follow."

"Yes, and exposure will follow anyhow," cried Frank bitterly, "so what difference does it make?"

"Ah," thought the major, "he's weakening. I'll have him."

"No, my boy," he continued in a conciliatory tone, "do as I wish and no unpleasant results will ever come of it. Moreover, for doing me this slight service I intend to give you one hundred dollars."

To do Frank justice, this offered reward had no effect in his thoughts at first. He was sincerely repentant of his previous error, and had resolutely determined to do nothing more of a similar nature.

But now in the face of the major's awful threat what wonder that he wavered?

If he refused he would be discharged from his position in disgrace, he knew Mr. Mademoiselle well enough for that. No breach of confidence of such a nature would be overlooked. He was not wise enough to know that the major would hardly dare compromise his own interests by fulfilling his threat. He fully believed he would keep his word.

Then a vision of the hundred dollars danced before his eyes.

To tell the truth Frank had lately been getting into bad company, and was beginning to feel his salary cramped. Extravagant habits and fast companions had dragged him to the brink of that road to ruin which so many young men are daily travelling. A kindly hand might have pulled him back. The major was shoving him forward. He had a few annoying debts. The hundred dollars would clear them up and leave a balance for a new suit of clothes.

The major's keen eyes noted his victory.

"Come," he said, "we had better go down town. It is getting late. I shall be here tomorrow at four o'clock. Bring the will up for me to examine. I will return it to you in five minutes, and the hundred dollars with it. Can you open the box?"

"Yes," said Frank hesitantly, "I have half a dozen keys at the bank, and one of them fits a box similar to the squire's. I think I can open it. If I don't come tomorrow afternoon, you will know that I have had no opportunity."

"Then I will be here the following afternoon at the same hour," said the major.

They passed down stairs and parted at the door, Frank hurrying into a side street, while the major walked across the city and boarded a Third Street car.

"Five o'clock," he said with a glance at his watch. "I must go home by the six o'clock train. If I don't that rural Ford may commit some terrible blunder."

He reached the station twenty minutes before train time and was

RICHARD DARE'S VENTURE;

OR,
STRIKING OUT FOR HIMSELF.*

BY EDWARD STRATHEMER.

CHAPTER X.

THE FIRST NIGHT IN NEW YORK.

FOR an instant a feeling of intense loneliness swept over Richard's heart as he stood on the dark and silent pavement. He had freely consented upon spending the night at the Watch House, and now to find that place closed up caused his heart to sink within him. He reproached himself bitterly for having allowed his curiosity and love of looks to make him forgetful of his situation.

"How am I ever to get along in this world unless I watch out?" he said to himself dully. "I suppose it will do no good to knock on the door. By the way the place is located, the sleeping rooms must be upstairs in the rear, and I might jound till dawn without any one hearing me."

Nevertheless, he rapped loudly upon the door, no answer, but several times, and so hard that he drew the attention of the policeman on that beat.

"What are you trying to do?" asked the officer as he came up.

"I want to get in," and Richard related the particulars of his plight.

"You'll have a job, me boly," was the reply.

"Mrs. Betty slaps like a bag."

They waited for several minutes in silence. But nobody appeared and no word came from within.

"What are you going to do?" asked the policeman finally.

"I don't know, I'm sure. My wallet is inside with my money. I've only got twenty cents in change in my pocket."

"There's a lodging house in Washington Street where you can get a bed for that," went on the officer. "But it's not over clean."

"I don't want to go where it's dirty," replied the boy, shuddering.

And for a brief instant a vision of his own tent and tidy cot at home flashed through his mind.

"Well, oh damn; you can't stay out here."

While trying to plan what to do a man turned the corner and came toward them. By the walk Richard recognized Doc Elyard, and with a cry of joy he ran up to the old tar.

"Aha! so here you are?" exclaimed the sailor, his face beaming with satisfaction. "A nice chance you've led me! Where did you go to?"

"Nowhere. I stopped to look at some trucks, and then I couldn't find you again," replied Richard. "I'm so glad you're come. They're gone to bed."

"All below decks, eh? Well it's time. I've spent an hour looking for you over on the Battery. How are you, Mulligan?" the last to the policeman, who nodded pleasantly.

Producing a key, Doc Elyard opened the restaurant door. Then he handed the policeman a cigar as a reward for the trouble the officer had taken, and the two entered.

The old sailor locked the door carefully behind them and lit a hand lamp that his thoughtful wife had placed upon the front counter.

"I thought such places as this kept lights all night," observed Richard, as they walked back.

"Most of 'em do,—them as has gas. But the insurance companies think 'em dangerous, so we do without."

Doc Elyard preceded the boy up a narrow stairway to a small room on the third floor.

DR. GALEEN was sitting under a student lamp in his cosy little office. His well browned overcoat, a jar of tobacco, his favorite magazine, and the daily papers, were lying on the table by his side.

Such an array of temptations were usually irresistible, but tonight Dr. Galeen was too deeply immersed in thought to pay heed to anything. It was the same old story—the squire's strange illness. His reputation and his skill as a physician were at stake, so the doctor reasoned, unless he could conquer the malady, or at least reduce it to definite terms.

"Strange, strange," he muttered; "all medicines seem to be powerless, and yet the disease remains stationary—keeps within bounds. His weakness increases, there is the nervous point. And Wiseman was as far off the track as I was, with all his skill and years of experience. The main point is to tone up the squire's system, but so far I have tried every known remedy in vain. Ah, I wonder what effect phosphorus would have in this case! The celebrated Dr. Paris used to employ it as a stimulant for the nervous system on rare occasions. I'll have a look at that."

CHAPTER I.

THE RESULT OF AN ACCIDENT.

"WHAT has happened?"

"Hurry up."

"Any one hurt?"

"Bolton was knocked down and had his leg broken. That's all."

"Great Scott! Isn't that enough? Now, you don't mean Uncle Jim Bolton, the peddler?"

"That's just who I mean. They've carried him in the drug store. And the gentleman who had imparted the information walked coolly off, leaving Richard D. Baker, Jr., staring first at the apothecary shop, around which a large crowd had gathered, and then at the departing figure."

The scene transpired in a thriving little town in western Illinois, which, for good reasons, we will call Kirkville. Kirkville's entire police force—a little man with a blue suit—kept the crowd out of the drug store, for it had been many a day since Kirkville had seen such excitement.

The cause of the accident was not far away. Two angry citizens held the horses by the bits. The driver was a milky-eyed, white-haired youth of seventeen, whose countenance was usually sallow, and suggested considerable shyness; but at the present moment it was white enough to scrape chalk from. His teeth were chattering so that he could scarcely speak, and it was with an effort that he said: "I couldn't help it; I don't I couldn't! I was on my way down to Mackery's to get some goods just bought. They belted in the other block, an' I couldn't hold 'em. I pulled for Bolton to get out of the way."

"An' then drove straight on him," blurted one of the men angrily. "He's not so shy as he used to be. Funny how you stopped so quick after you run over him. If you had not used your whip so free they wouldn't have run."

"You an' your pap's been bringin' about how you'll run Bolton off the road," said a rough individual, coming up with several others, "an' I reckon you've done hit now. Doc says his leg's broke in two places, an' he'll be several months before he kin go on the road agin."

"If hit was me," said a man, "I'd tie him up an' whop him till he broke loose!"

At this cheering information the youth made several ineffectual attempts to get off the wagon, and a citizen, more kind hearted than the rest, said compassionately:

"Oh, let the boy go. Don't you see he is nearly frightened to death? If any one wants him, we know where to find him."

The young men who had held the horses' heads stepped away at this, and the young gentleman in the spring wagon had no time in starting.

"When?" shrieked Dick Baker. "I like that! If I—he'll, Chubby Matthews!"

"Hello, Dick!" And the young gentleman who had been hurrying along as fast as he could move his one hundred and seventy-five pound body came to a sudden stop in front of his friend. "I've been looking for you everywhere. Say, this is bad news I hear."

"Yes, it is bad for Uncle Jim."

"How did the accident happen?"

"Andy Mason says the team balked, but I have never heard of them balking anything but their feed. There are people in the crowd that say the moment Andy saw Uncle Jim was going to cross he began to use the whip."

"Andy's father and Uncle Jim are in the same business," mused Dick. "I wonder if Andy is mean enough to have done that on purpose?"

"Some seem to think he did," replied Dick seriously. "At any rate the accident could not have happened in a more favorable time for them, for Uncle Jim has his wagon packed and intended to start on the road in the morning."

"Well, Uncle Jim isn't rich by a long ways. He's made, too, that he is liable to be on his back for some time, and those horses are going to eat just the same as when they work—say, walk down the street with me; I've thought of something."

"Don't forget what it is before you get a chance to tell me," Dick replied in much anxiety. "We are away from the crowd now; what is it?"

"I DON'T WANT NOTHIN' TO DO WITH YOU FELLERS," DECLARED THE FARMER.

CHAPTER IV. OFFICIOUS TEARMS.

"WHAT'S up?" demanded Chub, a trifle bewildered, trying to make out the shadowy form that stood in the center of the tent. All he could distinguish was that it was a very tall one.

"You're not," said the man.

"Who're you?"

"You can call me Fory, an' my partner'll show up if any one calls for Hoper."

"Then there are two of you?"

"Nobody said there wasn't."

"Well, what do you want?" asked Chub, sitting up again, and trying to throw a good deal of fierceness into his tone. "Dick? Dick?"

The man promptly shoved him back with his feet, and said angrily:

"That's my business! The other feller's sleepin' peaceful, an' there's no use makin' him. I told you once before not to kick up a row. I've got a good piece of hickory in my hands that you'll feel the weight of if you don't be still an' keep quiet!"

Chub exclaimed:

"Easy, Hoper, ain't you about ready?" the man called softly.

"In a minute," replied a voice in the direction of the wagon. "Better pull the pegs on that tent."

"One of those tents is awakes."

"You ain't dead of him are you?" cried Hoper angrily. "When we took this job I didn't lose an den't it all."

"You ain't done it all an' I know of," growled Fory. "Now, look yere, feller," he continued, addressing Chub, "if either of you' tries any more'n' around while we're yere you'll git neck deep in trouble. See?"

Chub couldn't see very much, but he understood a great deal. The moment the man left the tent he aroused Dick.

"What's the trouble?" asked the latter.

"Morning already?"

"Yes, and there's a couple of fellows here taking all we've got!"

That was enough to cross all thoughts of sleepiness from Dick's mind, and he sat bolt upright, just as Fory began to pull the pegs.

A moment later the tent was whisked off and rolled up, leaving the boys sitting on their hands and feet staring at the surroundings. The horses had been hitched to the wagon, and a small man was taking down the tent rope. Fory turned the folded tent upon the wagon, and then approached the boys, saying:

"You folks are mighty high toned, sleepin' on blankets an' benches. Me an' my partner think we're mighty lucky when we find a straw stack to sleep on, let alone blankets."

He caught hold of the corners of the blankets as he spoke, and without any ceremony hauled them from under the boys.

"Gays in THE Argosy of last week.

"This is a little too much!" cried Chub, indignantly.

"If it gets too deep to make, why swim," advised Fory.

"Yams fellows waterer stay right where y'are till we git to the road," was Hoper's threatening injunction, as they clambered upon the wagon.

And quickly turning the team they rode toward the road at a rate that threatened to leave the wheels behind.

"Come on," cried Dick, paying no attention to Hoper's orders.

"We have got to keep them in sight."

The boys reached the road just in time to see the wagon disappear in the gray dawn of morning, in the direction they had come. They heard a coarse laugh, and the rattling of the wheels, which soon died away, leaving them standing in the road in profound silence.

"THE HOUNS FIELD IS," SHOUTED DICK, "AN' I'VE GOT A WARRANT HERE."

"We're in a nice fix now," Chub said desperately. "Every cent we had is stowed away in a thread box in that wagon, and all we've got is on our backs."

"They're gone the way we came," said Dick. "I wish some one would suspect that something is wrong and arrest them."

"No danger of their being apprehended unless they drive into Kirkville," Chub replied bitterly, "and I should think they would

A FRIENDLY FOE.

BY WILLIAM MURRAY GRAYTON.

A strange adventure, perhaps, as any man can relate, fell to my lot while I was superintending the construction of a branch railway in the Province of Hyderabad, Southern India.

This branch was one hundred miles in length, running from Hyderabad to a small military post called Wadi, where it joined the Western Railway of India. From Wadi almost half way to Hyderabad extended the immense jungle of Deon, frequented by various wild animals, and by a still more savage people, a class of degraded Hindus, who lived in huts in the recesses of the forest, and subsisted on wild fruits and game.

To these people the railway was an object of detestation. They had a wholesome dread of the English, however, and with the exception of an occasional theft of tools, or the casting of stones at our workmen, they did not molest us.

It was a formidable undertaking to build a roadbed through such a dense and malarious jungle, but we overcame all difficulties boldly and were now nearly half way to Hyderabad.

As the railway progressed the telegraph line was put up at the same time, and thus constant communication was kept up with Wadi. At a point only five miles distant from the eastern edge of the jungle, and nearly forty five miles from Wadi, we erected a transit station, installed therein a telegraph operator, and brought forward large quantities of tools and machinery from Wadi. And when everything looked most favorable we were startled by a rumor that the wild men of the jungle were arming themselves and combining together with the avowed intention of slaying the engineering corps, and destroying the station.

The news came to us from sources, the reliability of which we had no reason to doubt. Our party comprised five Englishmen and a large number of native workmen. These latter we promptly armed, and prepared in other ways to defend the station.

The jungle men owned very few firearms, and if only our own workmen showed proper valor, we had little fears as to the result of the attack. That very night, however, every one of the animals scented off, leaving to face the enemy.

Only the five of us were left, and our situation was decidedly serious. It became even more so an hour later when we discovered that telegraph communication with Wadi was cut off.

"The mammals mean business," said Jack Hunt. "This looks as though they were

ALL IS SETTLED.

"GOIN' to California!" ejaculated Mr. Tuxton in a dazed tone.
 "Yes, I've seen John Heywood—that's what I went to

 "Goin' to walk, I s'pose," said Seth Tuxton.
 "I'm going across the plains, if that's what you mean."
 "Where are you goin' to get the money? It will cost a good deal."
 "I have made arrangements about the money."
 "Is John Heywood goin' to supply you with funds?"
 "I'd rather not tell," answered Grant mysteriously. He was glad that this idea had occurred to his stepfather, as he did not wish him

"What right have you to stop me?" demanded Grant, not very much softened.

"I'm your stepfather."

"Yes; but you're not my guardian."

"Mind, I don't say I'll stop you," said Seth, for an idea had occurred to him whereby he might turn the expedition to his own advantage. Should Grant bring back a good sum of money, he meant to get control of it, and thought he should succeed on account of the boy's being so young.

"No, Mr. Tuxton, it wouldn't be any use."

"Then John Heywood really think you can make it pay?"

"He says there's piles of gold there."

"Piles of gold!" repeated Seth Tuxton, an expression of greed striding over his face.

"Yes, that's what he said."

"I wish I was a young man. I ain't sure but I'd go myself. But I'm sixty-eight."

"That's a little too old to go."

"If you are generous, Grant, take care of your money and bring

IN WHICH THE CURTAIN RISES ON THE BEGINNING OF THE END.

IT was very nearly midnight when Dr. Galen reached the farmhouse. The major answered his slight rap on the door, and led him straight to the sick room. Squire Penrose was slightly raised upon two pillows. His eyes were wide open, and he was perfectly conscious.

He recognized the doctor, and then inquired anxiously for Mr. Grimwood.

"He will be here presently," said the major. "Don't worry, father."

This seemed to quiet the squire, for he closed his eyes and fell asleep almost instantly. Dr. Galen and the major conversed in low tones, while the hours dragged slowly by. At five o'clock in the morning Jackson returned.

"Mr. Grimwood is out of the city," he said, "but his family expect him back at six o'clock. They promised to send him over at once, so I thought I had better return home and tell you."

The squire now awoke and inquired anxiously for the attorney. Dr. Galen and the major held a hasty consultation. The major was quite nervous, the doctor cool and collected.

"Your father is losing strength rapidly," he said, "but by the aid of a stimulant he can be kept up for possibly twenty-four hours; beyond that time I dare make no assertion."

The squire was informed that Mr. Grimwood would arrive in a couple of hours. This had such a pleasing effect that no stimulant was necessary just then.

He became much brighter, and declared that he was feeling quite comfortable. At seven o'clock the major retired to his room with the avowed intention of taking a short nap. Several times the knocker on

OF THE LIMITED EXPRESS.

"All tickets, please."

It was the train conductor of the limited express from Chicago to St. Louis who spoke.

With the natural curiosity of youth, Dredwood Dyleman, twelve years of age, who was in one of the forward sections, turned from the fascinating occupation of watching the rolling landscape through one of the windows, to inspect the railroad official as he advanced down the aisle. The well fitting uniform, brass buttons and matty cap deeply impressed him, and he looked with admiration upon the conductor as a privileged personage and one of the "lords of the rail." To him, at that time, a conductor occupied the highest position of distinction and authority in the railroad service, and in his youthful ambition he had never dared aspire to such an exalted station.

Conductor Ochoff was really a fine looking man, even without the badge of service—his uniform—and would have impressed the most casual observer. His features were clear cut, and though there was the early flush of health and youth in his face, his gray hair told that he was past his prime, or that a bitter sorrow or bereavement had bitterness his life.

He was collecting tickets and fares in the sleeper, because at the time of which we are writing the practice of having the sleeping car conductor do that service, and then turn over his collections to the train conductor, had not been inaugurated.

Young Dyleman, or Dred as he was familiarly called, watched with considerable interest the process of collecting fares and passing tickets. The conductor's bright nickel plated ticket punch reminded him of a needle more than anything else, and he smiled as he remembered a funny story his mother had read to him about a countryman,

A LEAF FROM THE PAST.

"WHAT do you mean?" faltered Dash, anxious for an explanation of the unexpected announcement that he whom he had regarded as his father was not so in fact, and that his grandfather did not know what his name was.

"I mean just what I have said, Dash," replied Mr. Dykeman tranquilly. "I do not know your name, but Dykeman is as rightfully yours as my under the circumstances."

"Grandfather, do you mean to say you do not know the name of my mother before she married your son?" asked Dash in wonderment.

"That is it exactly, Dash."

"Why, how could that be?"

"Easy enough, Dashwood," began Mr. Dykeman; "and when you have heard my explanation of my ignorance you will understand how such a curious fact came about."

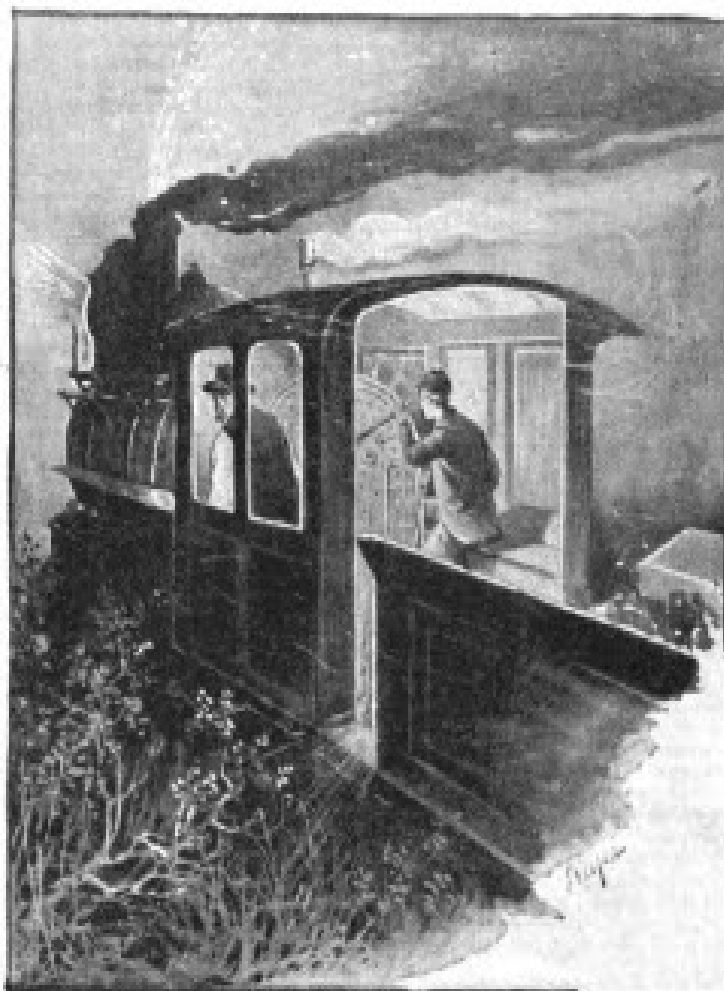

"When my son was twenty-four years of age, and eight years before that, we had living with us an orphan girl, Lily Woodbridge by name, whose father dying, had left her in my charge, with an inheritance barely more than enough to provide for her sustenance. We very soon came to regard her with as much affection as if she had been our own, and it was with much pride we witnessed her remarkably rapid advancement in her studies. When she graduated from the high school, we were much gratified to notice that our son began to take a keen interest in all that concerned Lily. He devoted himself assiduously to her for some time, and finally announced their engagement. This result had been the secret desire of our hearts, and we rejoiced accordingly."

"Their marriage had been postponed until my son should establish a business for himself, and finally, when he was twenty-four years old, he went to Michigan to look after some lumber matters there. He bade Lily and us an affectionate farewell, and I had noticed nothing that would indicate any change in his purpose of marrying her."

"Well, weeks, months, and finally a year, passed, and nothing was heard from my son by either ourselves or Lily. The poor girl was dreadfully grieved at such neglect, for she loved him devotedly; and notwithstanding our anxiety as to our boy's whereabouts, and the cause of such a protracted silence, we were much interested against him. Finally a letter came, pleading as an excuse for his negligence that he had been off in the pine woods hundreds of miles from a settlement, where he had been very busy, and had been "all for several months."

"Lily brightened up a little after that, and I wrote him a pretty sharp letter about the way he had treated us. He never replied to that letter, and we heard nothing from him for another year. Lily almost pined away to a shadow, worrying and waiting, and we hardly knew whether to be angry or mourn him as dead. Finally we received a letter from him dated at St. Louis, in which he made no mention of Lily at all, and distinctly stated he was about to marry a widow with one child barely two years old."

BRAD MATTOON; LIFE AT HOSMER HALL.

BY WILLIAM D. MORTAL.

CHAPTER I.

THE NEW BOY AT HOSMER.

"HELLO, who is that fellow?"

"Don't know. He looks as if he had seen pretty hard service somewhere, I should say."

"Rather interesting, isn't he? What a queer outfit! If it wasn't winter I'd say he was off sporting, either gunning or fishing."

"I like his face."

"Where on earth did he get so brown this season of the year. He looks like a Cuban or Spaniard."

But he was neither. He was simply a fine, healthy specimen of an American boy, and as he stepped off the south-bound train and stood upon the platform of the railroad station at Framford, he presented a figure well calculated to arouse interest.

His compact, well knit form, was clad in a close fitting, and somewhat worn suit of brown corduroy, while upon his head was a soft hat of the same material, completing an outfit that was striking and peculiar.

The whole effect was brown—brown suit, a brown albatross skin vest, along about his body, dark curly brown hair, and a complexion bronzed by long exposure to sun and wind. While somewhat odd, his appearance was decidedly attractive. His face, of which a pair of handsome gray eyes formed the main feature, was interesting to a degree, and bore a good humored, happy-go-lucky expression with just a dash of recklessness in it that was peculiarly telling.

As he descended to the platform he seemed for a moment to doubt. Turning about, he glanced up and down the station as if in search of something. At length he caught sight of the conductor in which the two speakers and six or seven other boys were seated. Immediately he came forward.

"Is this the conductor that runs to Hosmer Hall?" he asked the driver.

"Yes," was the answer.

"When do you start?"

"Right away."

The boy sprang lightly up and seated himself beside the driver. The latter then snapped his whip, and the conductor rolled off through the town.

The other occupants of the vehicle looked at one another in surprise. "Why, he must be the new fellow," whispered one of those who had been commenting on the newcomer's appearance to his companion.

"What new fellow? Our number is full now."

"No. My roommate, Harry Segals, had to leave the academy suddenly just before the holidays. Didn't you know his father failed in business?"

"Why, no, I didn't know that. That was mighty hard luck. I must write Harry a letter of sympathy. Perhaps this is a new fellow, then."

latter, however, showed not the slightest sign of discomposure, but took matters with a coolness of manner that served only to fan the flame of Ivers's anger to a fiercer heat.

"See here," he exclaimed, "what do you mean by using such language as you did to us down stairs?"

"What did I say?" asked Brad, as if the whole matter had passed out of his mind.

"You as much as said that we were no gentlemen," answered Ivers.

"Did I, though?" rejoined Brad. "I said that I judged gentlemen by their manners and not by their clothes. If you think that means that you were not gentlemen, then I take it there must have been something wrong with your manners."

Ivers was almost beside himself.

CAUGHT IN A TRAP.

WHILE Brad's suspicions had been somewhat aroused by the curious sounds from the pantry, he was by no means prepared for the scene disclosed to view through the chink beneath the partially raised window. One glance convinced him of the seriousness of the situation.

Two masked men stood in the center of the pantry, one of them holding a dark lantern, while the other was fastening the neck of a sack which rested on the floor. What the sack contained, Brad, of course, did not know, though it was not difficult to guess, for the doors of the safe, set in the opposite wall, which held the silverware, had been forced open, and the shelves were empty.

Brad had but a moment to think, for the men were working quickly. He had never in all his adventurous life known a moment of absolute fear, and in the present case, when the first shock of surprise had passed away, no thought of the personal risk he incurred entered his mind. In the few seconds he stood there motionless his only idea was of devising some effectual means of frustrating the plans of the burglars, who were now hastily preparing to make away with their booty.

In those few seconds it suddenly flashed upon Brad that he had the day before placed in Perry Landon's locker a 22 caliber revolver which had always accompanied him on his travels, and which he had concluded to lock up securely when he learned that the rules of the academy forbade the use of firearms. He shared this locker with Landon, and had a duplicate key in his pocket.

He slipped quickly and noiselessly across the room, cautiously opened the locker and groped about for his weapon.

Just as his fingers touched the smooth, polished handle of the revolver, he heard soft footsteps in the room. Instantly he straightened up and turned around, tightly clasping the weapon in his right hand. He was just in time, for the men, having secured their gains, had left the pantry by means of the narrow hall which led into the lavatory, and were evidently intending to make their exit through the door which Brad had unlocked, and which now stood slightly ajar. The hand of one of the men was already on the knob.

"Here, drop that!" exclaimed Brad, cocking his revolver and leveling it at them. Immediately there was a quick exclamation of alarm—a crash as the lantern dropped to the floor—and then, before Brad had even time to fire, the men were outside in the passageway, and the door was slammed behind them.

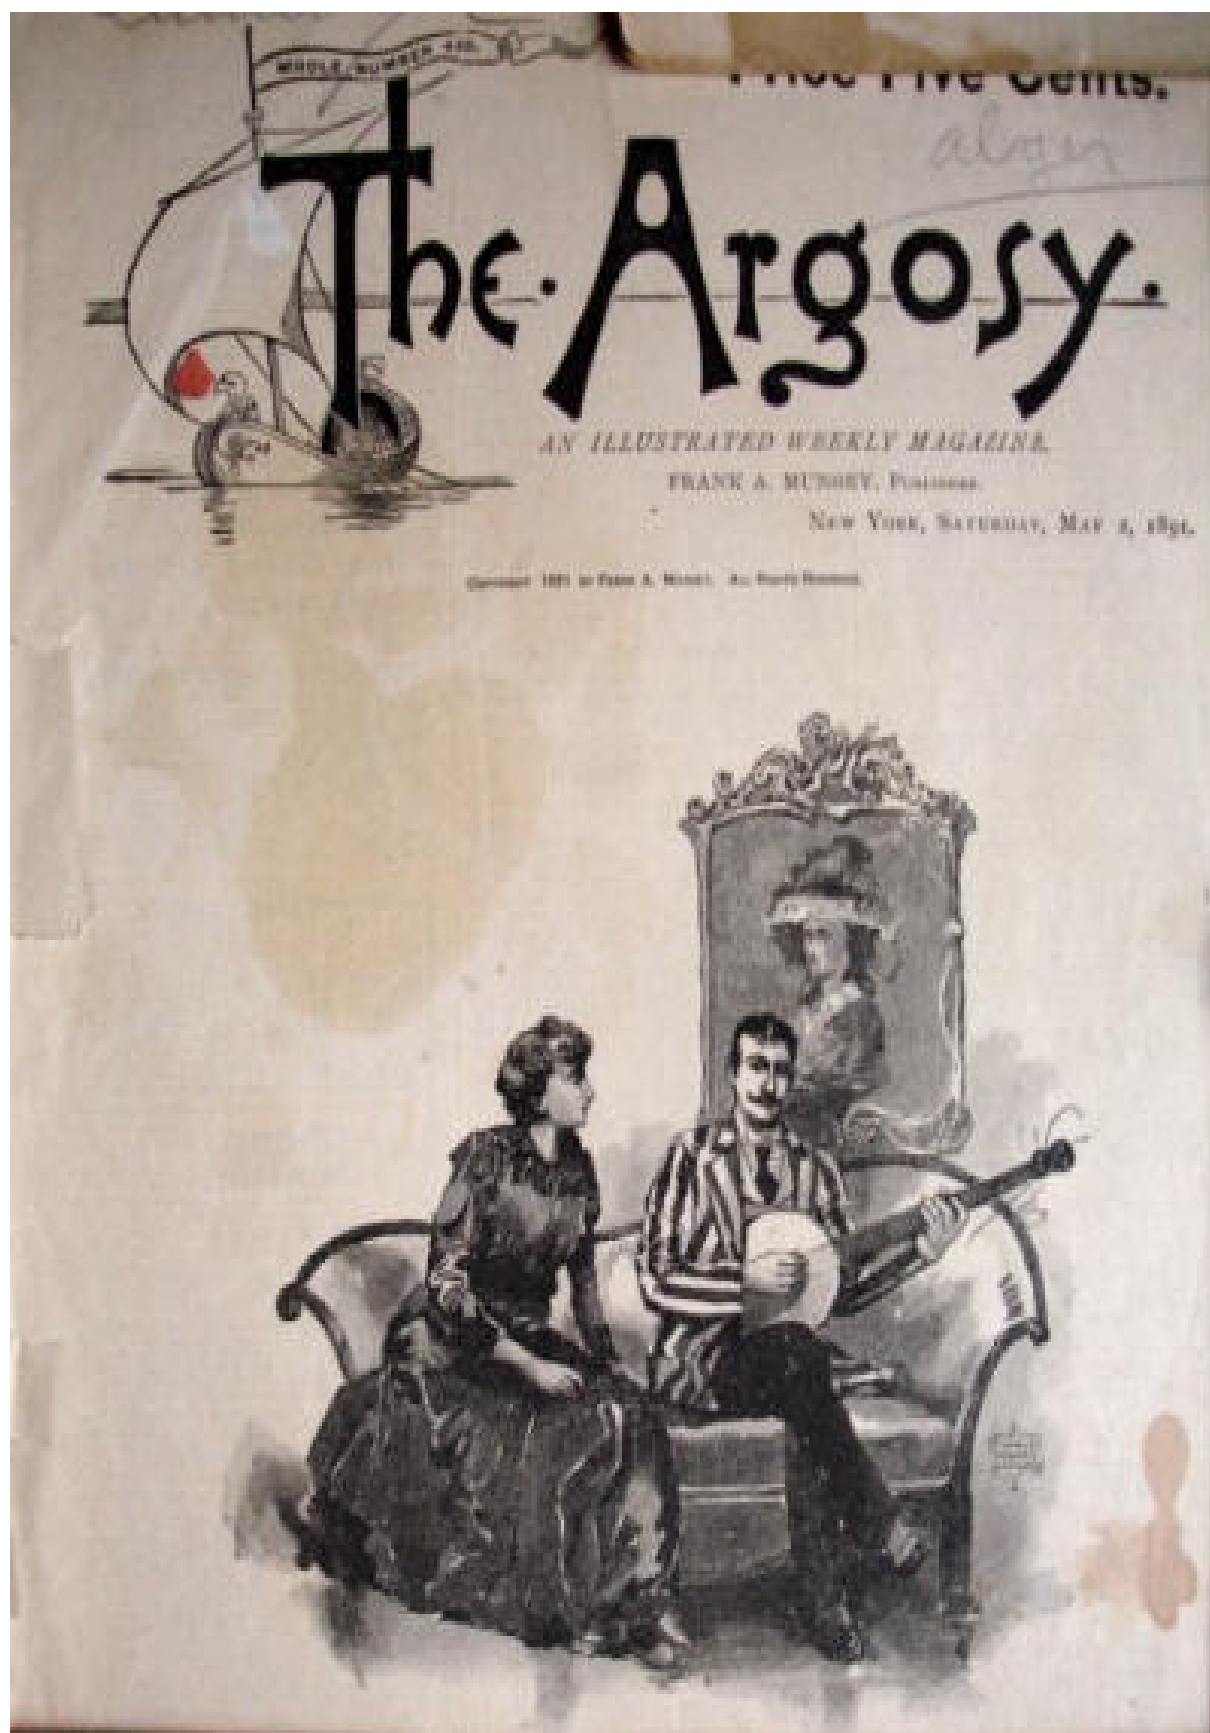

Brad rushed forward, threw open the door, and set off in hot pursuit of the thieves down the passageway. For a few seconds he could hear the clatter of their footsteps on the board walk a short distance in front of him, and he was about to raise his revolver and fire into the darkness, when the sounds suddenly ceased.

Brad hurried forward a few steps, then stopped and listened attentively. Not a sound greeted his ear—nothing but a death-like silence as oppressive as theinky darkness that hung about him like a pall. Brad was sorely puzzled. Where a few seconds before the footsteps of the men had resounded through the covered passageway with startling distinctness, now not the faintest echo indicated their whereabouts. They had disappeared as suddenly as if they had sunk into the earth.

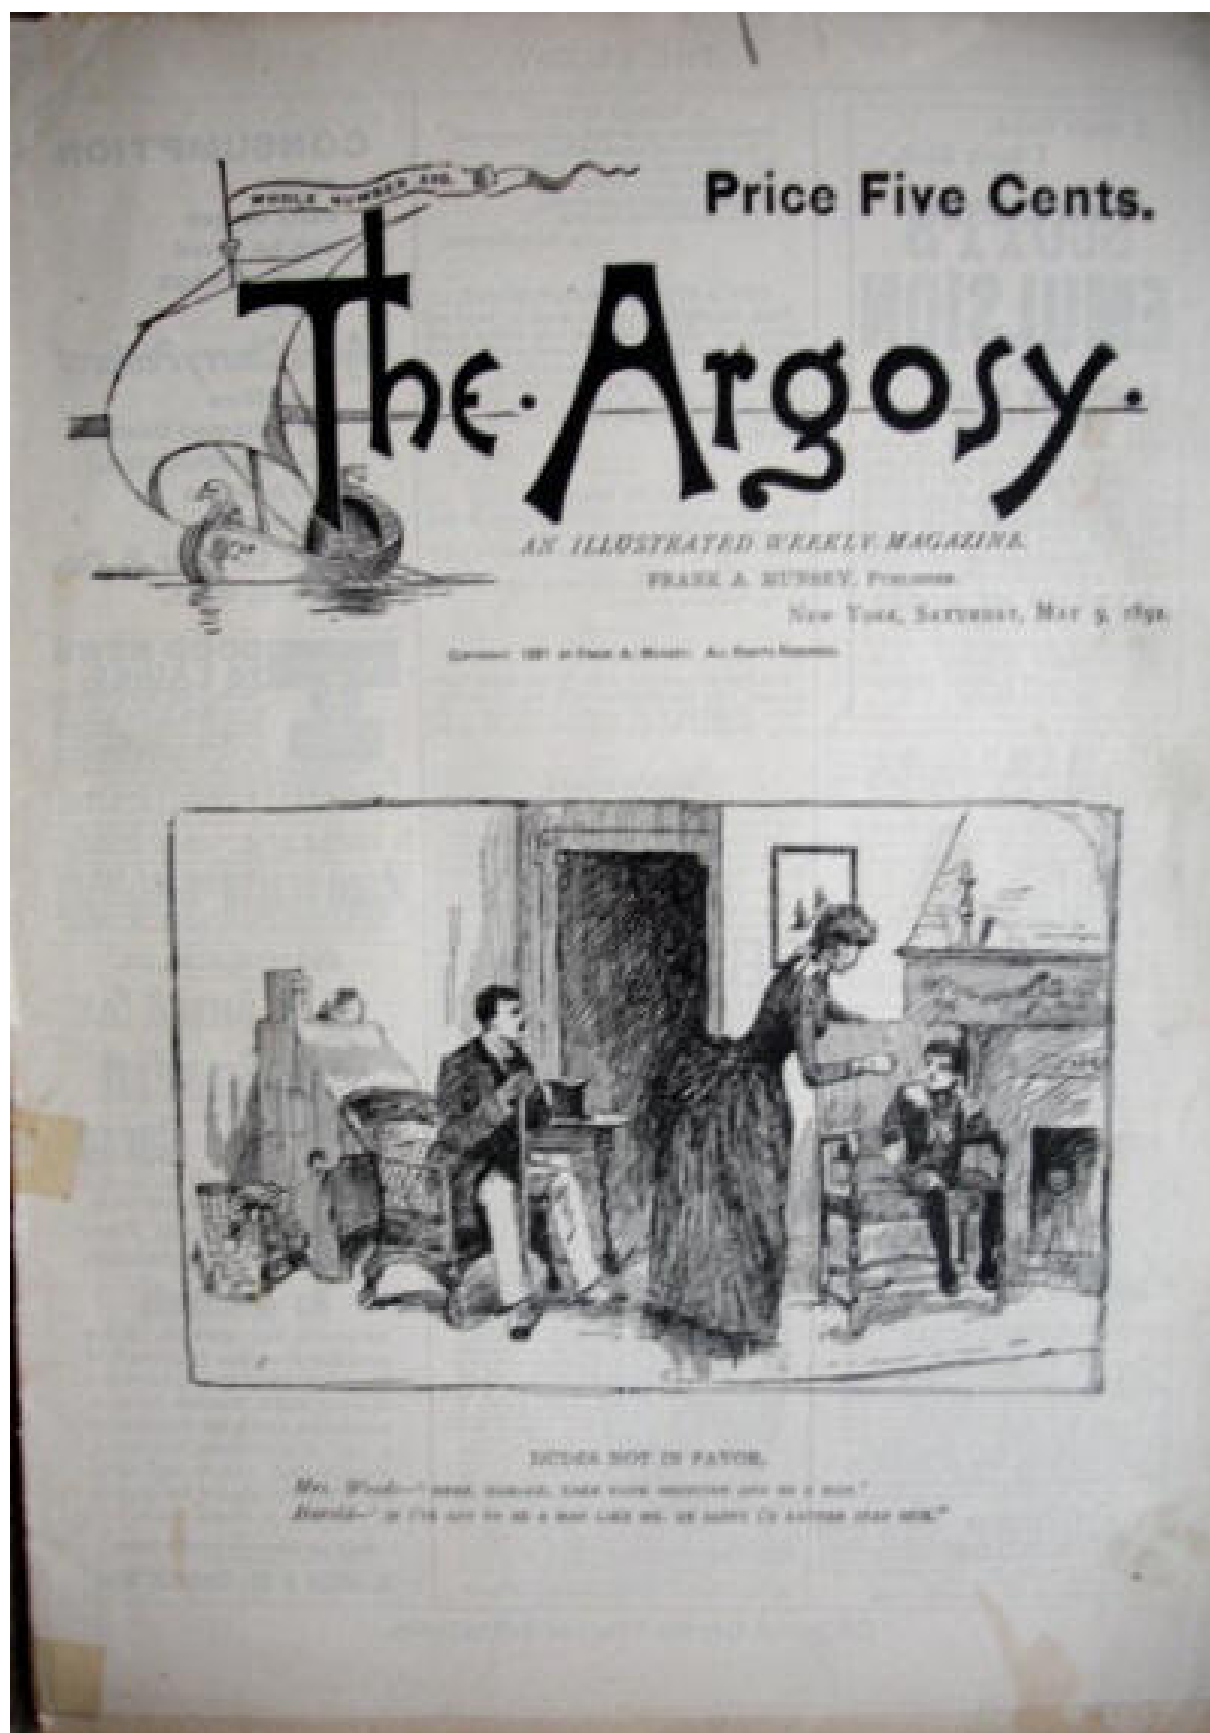

So dark was it that Brad could not see a single foot ahead, and he dared not advance for fear of hidden dangers. Then he remembered the lantern which one of the men had dropped upon the lavatory floor; so, determined upon piercing the strange mystery, he made his way back for the light. The lantern lay upon the floor, still lit, although the slide had been closed. Opening this, Brad held it before him, and advanced once more along the passageway, swinging the beam of light to and fro across his path. For a number of steps the lantern disclosed only the parallel boards of the flooring, but when he had reached a point about sixty feet from the lavatory door, the boards suddenly ceased, and the light shot forward through a large aperture deep into the ground.

Brad stopped in amazement. There was no mistaking it. Four or five boards had been removed from the walk, disclosing a large hole in the earth, the depth and nature of which he was at first unable to discern. Kneeling down

ARTHUR BLAISDELL'S CHOICE.*

BY W. BERT POSTER.

CHAPTER VII.

A SUNDAY IN THE COUNTRY.

ARTHUR BLAISDELL long remembered that first Sunday in the country. Hiram Hart made two trips to the city on Saturday, instead of running Sunday morning, winter and summer. As soon as they arrived home from the morning run preparations were made for the second trip, and they left about three o'clock. It was nearly midnight when they returned.

Arthur was tired enough when he turned in; but he was up in good season the next morning, and helped Hi about the barn. The roan mare was taken out and rubbed down until her coat was as sleek as silk, and Hi's buggy washed and cleaned. After breakfast there was a general cleaning up and putting on of best clothes all over the house. Even Loney was captured by Mrs. Hart, washed, dressed in some whole trousers and a clean, starched waist, his feet incased in shoes and stockings, and with sundry injunctions to keep his clothes clean, was allowed to go out and wander about the dooryard until Mrs. Hart should be ready for church.

The child was an unfailing source of amusement to Arthur, with his queer antics and funny remarks. He was plainly neglected, for Mrs. Hart had little time to attend to him, and his father, a city merchant, seldom evinced any interest in him, excepting to pay his monthly board bill and supply clothes when needed. So the poor little fellow lived on with the dogs.

When Mrs. Hart had finished her toilet she took Loney over to her sister's, and rode to church with Mr. and Mrs. Carpenter in their two-seated carriage. A little later Hiram and Art set out in their buggy, and old Mr. Hart was left alone at home.

*Begun in No. 439 of THE ARGOSY.

"We've got lots of time," said Hi, as they started, "and the mare feels first rate, so I'll take you the long way 'round and show you some of the country."

As they passed Mr. Pegrim's door a light carriage stood there, and Mr. Pegrim was just helping his wife in. She was a tall, angular woman, with a long nose and a sort of venomish look that was exceedingly unpleasant. Mr. Pegrim was also very tall and very thin, with light gray whiskers and a very sanctimonious cast of countenance.

"They don't go to our church," volunteered Hiram, as they drove by. "They go to some sort of a Universalist chapel down in Watchensket. Pegrim's what the Methodists would call an exhorter—he preaches whenever they let him."

"Where do you go?" inquired Art.

"To the Congregational, at the Center."

Arthur enjoyed the ride. The mare, as Hi had said, felt pretty good, and carried them along at a rattling pace. The road passed through woods and fields, by farmhouses and cultivated gardens, and finally they reached the square,

ARTHUR BLAISDELL'S CHOICE.*

BY W. BERT FOSTER.

CHAPTER X.

BILL CHASEY'S DIPLOMACY.

It might have gone hard with Arthur and his body ally had not a new actor now appeared on the scene. This was a tall man, who came striding along towards the schoolhouse, and, who immediately, on perceiving the fracas, joined Arthur and his companion against their antagonists. In the partial light Arthur recognized Mr. Templeton, the minister, and he quickly showed by the manner in which he laid about him with his cane, that he could control the rough element of the village with muscle as well as mind, if need be.

With the minister's assistance the enemy were quickly routed, and the victorious party returned to the schoolhouse, Mr. Templeton dragging one of the young rascals by the collar as a prisoner of war.

"You be a good lad, parson?" exclaimed the young farmer, wiping his face with a red handkerchief. "You seem ter me the usual wayward's with the 'sawd of the spirit.'"

"I am, sir," returned the minister firmly, still dragging along his struggling captive. "And it gives me a deal of satisfaction to lay it over such hoodlums as these. Come along, sir," to his captive, "and let us see who you are."

The minister showed his prisoner before him into the room where the excited company had gathered about the door.

"Well, now, who are you?" said Mr. Templeton, turning the face of the struggling boy towards the light. "Why, it's Bob Harris himself! Why, Bob, you are the very boy of all others whom I should have been glad to see here, for I've wanted to get you and Mr. Prentiss together for some time. Now, Bob," he continued, still holding the boy with a powerful hand, while an audible titter went around the room, "I want you right here and now to beg the master's pardon for the way you cut up last term at school, and for all you've done since to bother him, and to tell him how sorry you are, for I know you must be sorry; aren't you, Bob? Come, squawk up," and he shook him a little as an intimation that he expected an answer.

Bob murmured something that might have been "Yes, sir," and hung his head.

"I know you were sorry," said Mr. Templeton, with a twinkle in his eye; "and I want you to promise Mr. Prentiss that in the future you will respect him as more, and that if he will let you come back to school next term, you'll behave yourself. Will you?"

"Yes, sir," returned the now thoroughly cowed culprit, in a more distinct tone.

"All right, sir. Now you may go. But, remember," said the minister sternly, "you will get into trouble if you don't walk pretty straight hereafter. We can't have any more such work as this."

"You let him off altogether too easy, Mr. Templeton," said the young farmer, who had stood beside the minister all through the foregoing conversation. "Bob," he added, turning to Harris, who was stooping towards the door; "you know me. When I say I'm goin' to do a thing, I don't very easy back down. An' I'm a goin' to stand by the master in this, an' if you don't walk pretty straight you'll get the all goodest kickin' you ever had in your life!"

Harris shook out, and Mr. Templeton remarked with a smile:

"You should have made that decision before, Bob. This is rather late in the day."

"I know it, parson," returned the farmer, "an' I'm ashamed of myself for not doin' of it afore. But I didn't fully come here had it looked for the hall record till this young fellow here," pointing to Arthur, who had resumed his seat beside Bill Chasey, "put it before us in its true light. I ask the master's pardon I's not kickin' him up afore, but I'm with him hereafter."

"And me, too?" exclaimed a number of voices all over the room, following the young giant's example, for his hand some as well as his heavy hand went a good way with the younger portion of the community.

"Now, let us commence," said the minister, as the young farmer took his seat.

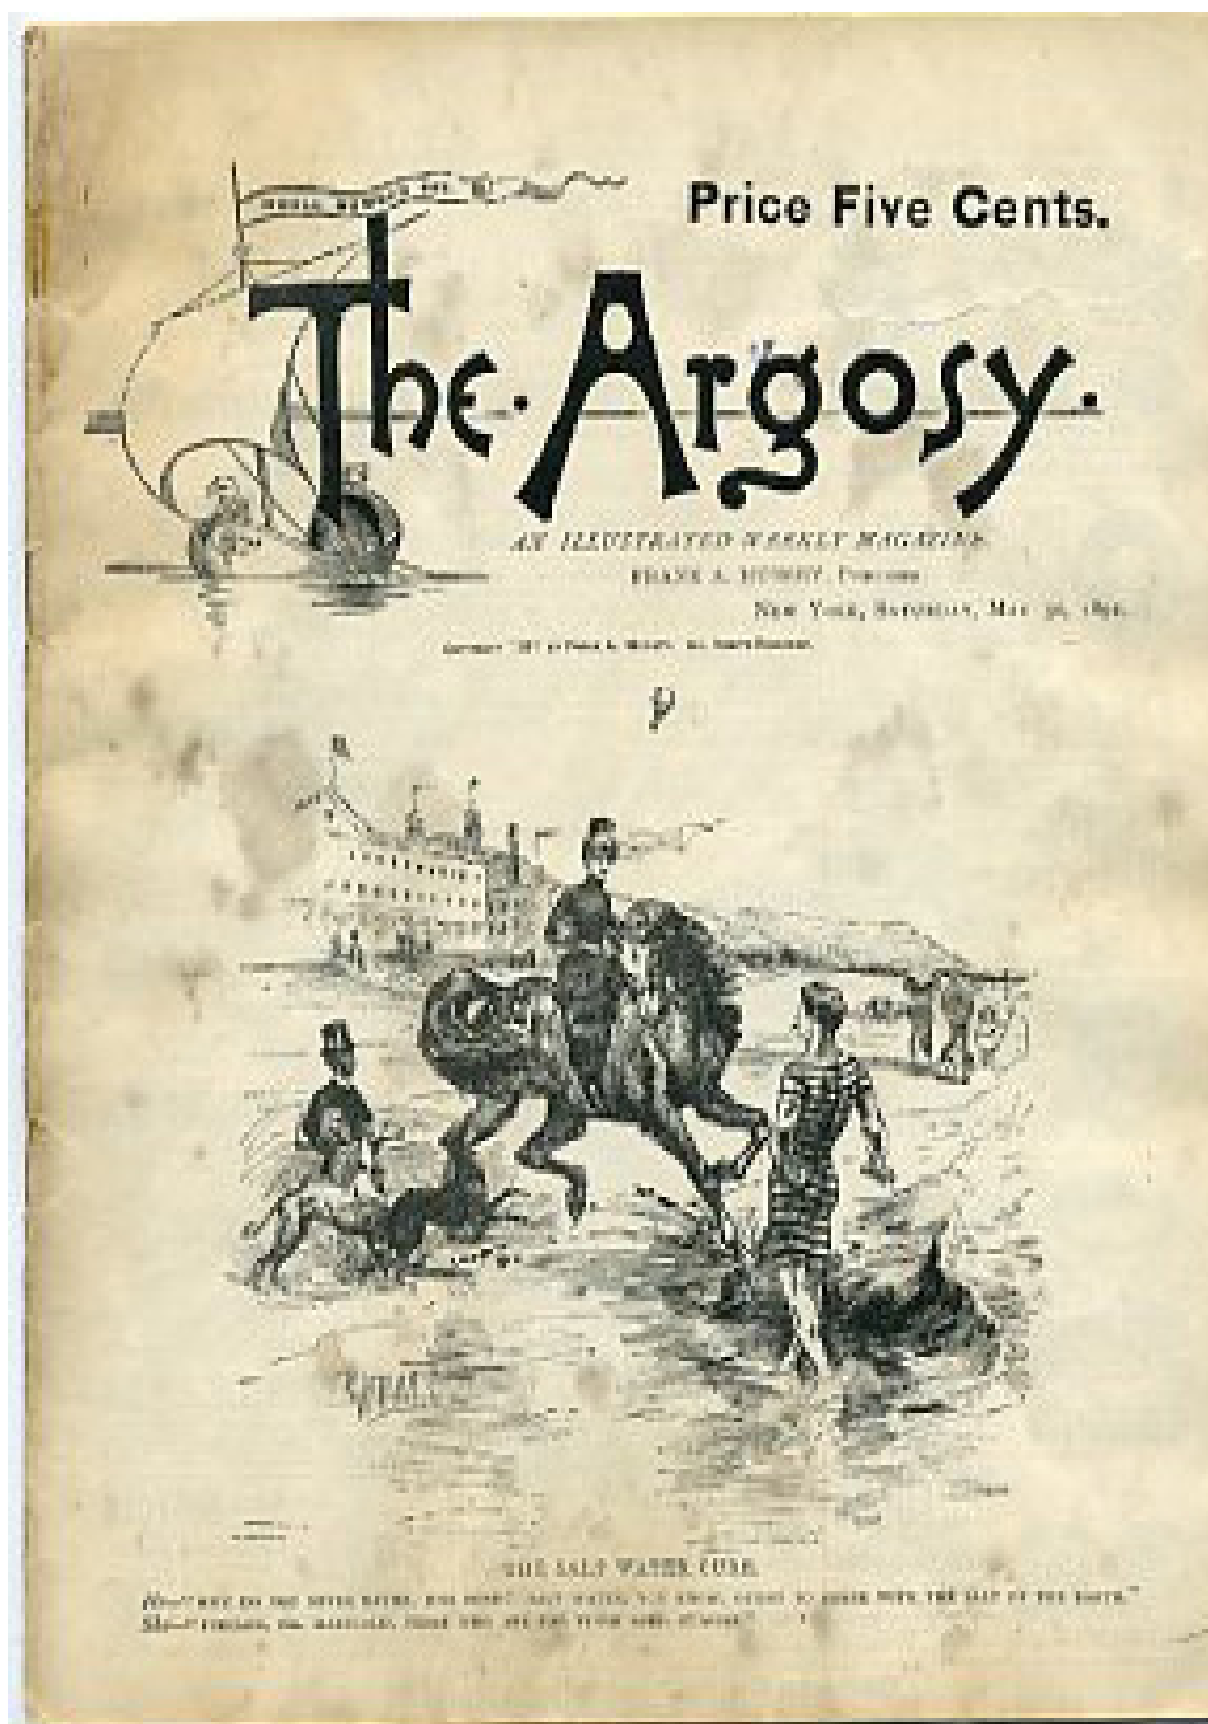

The meeting was opened, a short report was read by a young woman who acted as secretary, some items of business transacted, and then Mr. Templeton addressed the assemblage. His speech was short and pointed, with a lively vein of humor running through it all. He was followed by two or three exhortations, and a number of well known songs were sung, in which the company all joined. As a whole, it was a very creditable entertainment, considering the talent at command, and Arthur enjoyed it very much.

Among others he had recognized one of the ladies he met that morning—the child whom he noticed a poem, in rather a tragic style, to be sure, but still very well.

"WE WANT YOU," RETURNED BOB IN A GRUFF TONE.

GREAT PREMIUM OFFER TO READERS OF THE ARGOSY.

We will give a $25 BOYS' BICYCLE, twenty four inch wheel, adjustable, perfect in equipment and provided with all safe guards against danger, to any reader of THE ARGOSY who will send us a club of 100 three month subscriptions to THE ARGOSY at fifty cents each. For 50 six month subscriptions at one dollar each, or for 25 yearly subscriptions at two dollars each, or for any combination of these subscriptions that will bring us fifty dollars, we will give this splendid bicycle free of charge.

The Argosy Bicycle is built to correspond in size with the 26 to 28 inch size of the ordinary bicycle. The Wheels are 24 inches in diameter, have machine rubber tires, and both rim and spokes are made of No. 11 special steel wire, with both ends enlarged for strength. Strong levers are provided to strengthen and tension the different parts. Steel Dust Shields cover front and hind wheels. Rubber Foot Rests are provided on the front fork. The Steel Handle-Bar is adjustable in height, is of good length, with the ends bent forward and curved to bring the handles in the most comfortable position. An efficient Brake is applied to the front wheel. The Saddle is of the hammock pattern, of improved shape, and is stretched on a set of Elastic Wire Springs. A neat and convenient Tool Bag, containing Oil Can and Steel Wrench, and Spring Lamp Bracket are furnished with each machine. The Finish is most excellent, the frame of maple being varnished with several coats of the finest material, baked on a polished surface. All trimmings are nickel-plated.

This is a new opportunity for every bright, energetic boy to secure a superior bicycle. The world's best will come a wheel every time. To your friends and neighbors show them this offer and tell them that you want them to subscribe to help you, and make plans to show the fact that THE ARGOSY is the best paper in the world for boys and girls—a clean, bright paper, that teaches with interesting stories and helpful articles.

SPECIAL OFFER. If you prefer you can send part cash and part subscriptions. For instance: Twenty dollars' worth of subscriptions—either yearly or part yearly—and five dollars in cash will enable you to get a bicycle. Thirty dollars' worth of subscriptions and ten dollars in cash, or twenty five dollars' worth of subscriptions and fifteen dollars in cash, or for fifteen dollars in subscriptions or ten dollars in cash, we will send you this splendid machine. These subscribers must be new readers—not those who have been taking THE ARGOSY. Address

THE STORY IN THE CONTINUED.

OUR story opens in a cabin among the foothills of Colorado. It was built of logs, and was not over twelve feet in height. In the center was a hearth, with a small window on each side. Through the red rose window of the door, from which issued a slender shaft of smoke.

Let us enter.

The interior of the cabin is a narrow, long, comfortably furnished, while a garret covers the floor. On one side is a bureau, a few portraits are on the walls, a good bedstead and an easy chair, in which is reclining a man of middle age whose wasted form and hollow cheeks attest the ravages of consumption. From time to time he looked wistfully toward the door, saying to a boy near by: "Where is Gerald? He is gone a long time."

Five minutes later the sound of hoofs was heard outside, and a boy of sixteen galloped up from the canyon on the left, and, jumping off at the porch, tethered his pony and pushed open the door of the cabin. He was a marked contrast to the sick man, for he was strongly made, with the hue of health in his ruddy cheeks, and a self-reliant, manly look upon his attractive face.

"How do you feel, father?" he asked gently.

The sick man shook his head.

"I shall never be any better, Gerald," he answered sadly.

about you and asking him, as I had a right to ask him, to befriend you."

Gerald looked surprised.

"Why has he never helped you?" he asked.

"Because—well, I have not perhaps urged the matter sufficiently," he said.

"You say you did this man a service," said Gerald.

"Yes, I think the time has come when I should tell you what that service is. Let me say in the outset that I owed him gratitude at the moment

MIDSHIPMAN WARREN.

BY H. H. HARRINGTON.

"WHAT a beautiful place!"

"Yes, it is indeed a beautiful place, and a much more pleasant place to visit than it once was. Do you know that many an American ship has been brought into that harbor below us and stripped of its cargo, while the crew was either murdered or sold into slavery?"

"But surely not in the nineteenth century, father?"

"Yes, in the nineteenth century. Did your school histories never tell you of the daring piracies of the Algerian Moors, and of Bonaparte's expedition against them in 1810? It was not until the French soldiers drove the dey out of that big fort above us that this became a healthy neighborhood for civilized travelers."

The speakers were two Americans—father and son—who stood on the lofty quay that overlooks the harbor of Algiers, and commands one of the finest views in the world. Behind them and to their left, on the steep slopes of the towering bay, stood up the towers and minarets of the quaint ancient city. To the right swept the wooded heights of Montapin, whose scattered dwellings rose gleaming white amid the dark foliage of orange groves. In front, beyond the broad bay, whose waters were as deeply blue as the cloudless sky above, there rose against the eastern horizon the snow-clad peaks of the Kabylean mountains. It was no wonder that Harry Warren was moved to exclaim on the beauty of the scene.

"You ought to know something about the history of Algiers under the Deys, Harry," his father went on. "I should think it would have a special interest to you."

"Why so?" inquired the young tourist.

"Didn't you ever hear of the Algerian experience of my grandfather, Captain Warren, of the United States Navy?"

"Now, I don't think so," replied Harry. "I've heard of a good many adventures of his, but I don't remember that one. Was he captured by some of the old pirates?"

"Yes, and his capture came within an ace of ending there and then. If he had been cut off in his youth you and I could hardly have been here today."

"Was he in the navy then?"

"Yes, he was a midshipman on a American gun frigate called the Salem. It was his first cruise, and a long one, for the Salem had been ordered to the Levant. In those days our navy sailed on every sea, and the American flag was a more common sight in the ports of foreign powers than it is today. For nearly a year the frigate had been cruising in Eastern waters, when, on putting in at Alexandria in the April of 1811, the captain found awaiting him three orders to proceed at once to Gibraltar, and there place himself under the orders of Admiral Decatur."

The Phantom Horse of the Terai.

BY WILLIAM MURRAY GORDON.

"So you are going into the Terai, are you? Well, I wish you luck—and a safe return." As he said this Brown shrugged his shoulders and glanced at me in such a peculiar manner that my curiosity was instantly aroused.

Brown was our quartermaster, and he had been stationed as long in India that he knew pretty much all that was worth knowing—especially concerning that vast extent of jungle and mountains which borders the range of the Himalaya mountains and is commonly known as the Terai. The place had at all times reputation—especially for forests and dampness—but it was infested with large game of every sort, and for that reason Captain Lamson and I had determined on a shooting trip and obtained a week's leave of absence. We were new to this part of the country, and eager to explore a region whose chief charms was mystery.

"What is the matter with the Terai, Brown?" I asked. "It is not by any means healthy, I know, but I don't suppose a few days of it will hurt a fellow. We take plenty of malaria with us, of course. And then the shooting—every one says it is the best hunting ground in India."

"So it is," replied Brown. "Everything that goes on four legs is to be found there—tigers, elephants, bears, porcupines, and deer."

"What is there to be afraid of there, do you mean the wild animals? I don't suppose they are more ferocious in the Terai than any place else."

"Did you ever hear of the phantom horse?" replied Brown, solemnly. "If you catch a glimpse of that animal, I'll warrant you'll come out of the Terai a good deal faster than you went in."

"A phantom horse?" I exclaimed, sharply. "Nonsense! I don't believe in any such stuff as that."

"You may change your mind before you get back," said Brown. "The animal has been seen more than once and always at night. It dashes through the jungle at breakneck speed, unbridled and unbridled, but without a rider. Bullets have no effect on it—at least that's what they say."

"Who says so?" I demanded. "Hear you ever see it yourself, Brown? Come, tell me all about it. I'm beginning to be interested."

"I haven't time now," he replied. "I must go down to dinner on an errand. Wait until I come back this evening."

He turned away shaking his head, and as I saw his broad shoulders shaking I concluded at once that he had been trying to quiet me. Not caring to be made an object of ridicule in the whole regiment I said nothing to any one of the phantom horse, and in fact quite forgot the matter in the haste of preparation.

Something must have detained Brown, for he

Paine did not show in our quarters. He squatted close to the fire, throwing terrified glances into the darkness on either side, and when we inquired if he had ever heard of the phantom horse his teeth chattered so badly that we could not understand what he was saying.

We put this down to show nerves, for the natives are naturally superstitious and ready to take fright at the slightest provocation.

Well, the night passed without any alarm—though Paine did not sleep much, I fancy—and at dawn we were off for a day's sport.

Our success was not quite what we anticipated, for beyond a feeble glimpse of a tiger the big game kept well out of the way.

Late in the afternoon Lamson shot a small animal of the deer species, and soon afterward we made a camp for the night. The locality was a good one—an open glade in the center of a thick bamboo jungle. The ground was carpeted with matted reeds and we cut a good heap of these for bedding. We built our fire beside a pool of cold water and heated royally on boiled mutton.

We were in high spirits that night—full of bright anticipation for the morning despite our recent ill luck. Even Paine was content and free from alarm. After getting himself to the throat he rolled over and went to sleep on the reeds. Lamson and I smoked a pipe or two, gathered a heap of fire wood, and then followed his example, leaving Job Miller to stand guard—for he was the first watch. How long we slept I don't know, but my dreams were suddenly interrupted by a rude shake, and when I rose drowsily to my feet I found Lamson and Miller peering into the gloom, each with rifle in hand.

"What's wrong?" I demanded half angrily, for it is no pleasant thing to be roused from a sound sleep in the middle of the night.

Lamson raised a warning finger.

"Listen!" he said. "Do you hear that?"

I was wide awake instantly and as I picked up the rifle that lay by my side, I heard a dull pattering noise, and finally, mingled with it, a croaking of reeds, as though some great animal was flailing through the jungle.

A WHITE HORSE DANCED DAILY INTO THE OPEN GLADE.

did not come back that night, and bright and early on the following morning our little party started away from the encampment. It comprised, in addition to myself, Captain Lamson, his servant Job Miller, and a native guide, Paine by name. We traveled on foot, as horses would have been a hindrance rather than a help, and when sunset came we were far into the Terai.

That first night we encamped on a bit of firm ground almost surrounded by a canebrake swamp, and when we were gathered about the campfire after supper, smoking our pipes, I related Brown's story of the phantom horse to my companions. They were really amused, of course, and Brown's own would have laughed sharply had he been there to hear our conversation.

THOMAS CAPTURED A BEAR, EATING IT WITH AN OPEN MOUTH THAT ONE COULD HARDLY IMAGINE WAS WITHHELD FOR A Dainty MORSEL OF MEAT.

A SPICY BREAKFAST.

BY MARTIN WHITE, JR.

"COME on, Jack. It will be an experience of a lifetime. Uncle Ben always has the best of everything, and I tell you his roasting it will be of the most perfect sort. Besides, we were hoping that our vacation would come at the same time, and here is an opportunity that may never occur again."

This last argument clinched matters, and I told Tom I'd go. He was the oldest friend I had; we'd played and fought together as children, and now in one another at school, and now we were both beginning at the bottom round of the ladder of business in the harbor district. Tom's employer was his uncle, Ben Goodwin, while mine was a stranger whose advertisement I had answered.

I had begun work there the middle of June, as soon as I finished school, and somehow I did not expect any vacation. So when he called me up to him one afternoon in the latter part of August and said: "John, you may take your two weeks' vacation beginning the first Monday in September," I was most appreciably surprised.

The one drawback to my rejoicing was the fact that Tom's vacation had been set for the last two weeks of the same month. And now, when he came to me with the announcement that his uncle, who had been ill in the Adirondacks, had fallen ill and wanted Tom to come up and bring a friend, to occupy his camp till he recovered and get back, I strangely enough hesitated.

And for this reason. I had never been fond of hunting or of a hunter's life, and neither had Tom. We liked to row, bicycle, play tennis, baseball, and tramp one another at athletic sports, but as for a gun and a killing line, neither of them possessed any attraction for us. However, as I have said, the prospect of spending our vacation together finally decided me.

Mr. Goodwin had instructed Tom to draw a snug little sum for traveling expenses and we went up in style on the night boat, and through by drawing room car to Saratoga. Here Mr. Goodwin's guide met us, for nobody thinks of venturing into the Adirondack forests without such a safeguard, and by midnight we reached Hancock Camp.

"How do you like it, Jack?" whispered Tom, giving me a nudge.

"Seems kind of spooky just at present," I replied. "I wonder if there are any bears around."

"Guess not," rejoined Tom. "They must have all been killed by this time by summer travelers."

Well, we got out, unloaded our traps from the wagon and then this was driven back to Saratoga, leaving Tom and me and Buck, the guide, alone in the wilderness.

But Hancock Camp was a very comfortable spot.

The tent wasn't so small as I had expected to find it, and there were actually sheets on the bed, which gave forth a most delicate odor of pine needles. Then there was a good deal of rustic work in the furnishing, in the way of tables and chairs, which we found our Buck had carved himself.

He was a very nice sort of a chap, about thirty, rather quiet, and not a bit like the guides you generally have to deal with when you read about life in the woods. And what good coffee he could make, and fried potatoes! Tom and I feasted royally that night of our arrival, and then slept luxuriously on our pine smelling couch till far into the next morning, with Buck stretched out across the entrance way as a faithful guard.

The following day we talked about on the ground all the forenoon, rejoicing in the fact that we had nothing to do.

"I suppose if it was some fellow," remarked Tom, "they'd have had themselves roared out at daylight, shoulder a heavy rifle and tramp of through underbrush and swamp land for miles, under the impression that they were having fun."

"Everybody is his boss," as the old lady said when she kissed the cow," I rejoined. "Still I suppose hunting about this way all the time would pull on us in the end. So we might as well plan to do something this afternoon. I wonder if there is any water near?"

"Yes, a lake, and Uncle Tom has a canoe on it."

CHAPTER I.

A SCENE OF THE NORTH.

ON the morning of the 10th of April, 1891, Captain Andre Dagmar was breakfasting in his apartments on the second floor of No. 11, Nevsky Prospekt. He was seated at a small table which held a steaming samovar, a slice of broiled fish, caught that very morning in the Gulf of Finland, a plate of hot rolls, and a silver cigarette case bristling with monograms and coronets. From the window at his side he could look down into the main thoroughfare of the Imperial City of St. Petersburg, that splendid boulevard which extends for two miles from the Moscow railway terminus to the banks of the Neva.

Captain Dagmar was a sturdy, well-built, young man, twenty-four years of age, with handsome features, light blue eyes, light hair, and a soft moustache and beard of the same color. He was the eldest son of Count Vasily Dagmar, a captain of the Imperial Guard of Cossacks, and (this is confidence) an under-secretary to Colonel Jaroslav, the chief of the divided Third Section of police—three attributes which accorded to Captain Dagmar a high place in the social circles of St. Petersburg.

Suddenly a servant entered from an inner apartment and handed his master a paper which still bore the fresh odor of the presses.

"Ah! the Chronicle!" exclaimed Captain Andre. "It is late this morning, Sasha. No, thank you, I want nothing now," and as the servant returned the captain tapped back his chair and spread out the paper upon his knees.

"Has anything happened, I wonder, during my brief absence?" he murmured. "Hardly, though, for the Chronicle would have notified me—Hullo! what does this mean?"

The first page of the sheet slipped heavily to the floor, and the rubly dash on Captain Dagmar's cheeks faded swiftly away, leaving in its stead an ashen pallor. For an instant he gazed fixedly at the printed columns, which had suddenly become hallowed by the breathing of his hands, and then in a low, surprised voice he read aloud:

"The famous writer, Sergei Maykov, who was concerned in the recent dynamite plot and in the publication of the revolutionary journal, the Free Press, has at last been located in the city and the police are confident of arresting him before long."

Captain Dagmar tossed the paper on the table. "The time has come," he muttered. "It has come at last—and yet I knew that this end was inevitable. Unhappy man! He has brought this all on himself. He refused all advice, all warning."

The captain placed a cigarette between his teeth, and without lighting it, rose to his feet and began to pace the room nervously. No alarm was visible on his face, but rather an expression of keen interest and sympathy for this misguided Nikolai.

CHAPTER V.

A LUCKY ESCAPE.

SENOR MASLOFF'S lucky star was surely in the ascendant that night. In the fall that followed his search on Donald the latter struck the back of his head on the stone parapet of the bridge and rolled over to the ground without sound or motion.

A gleam of satisfaction shone in Masloff's eyes. He hastily produced a small pistol and laid over his victim, who already showed signs of recovering consciousness, for the blow had been a very slight one.

Masloff opened the pistol—which at once disclosed a strong odor of chloroform—wound underneath a handkerchief with part of the contents, he pressed it against Donald's nose and held it there until it had thoroughly done its stupefying work.

A heavy gleam shivered Masloff that the man was dead, and without hesitation he stripped off his own wet clothes, and then with deft hands he divested Donald of his neat suit of English tweed. A moment or two later the clever transformation was effected. Masloff stood in the garments of his victim, and Donald was arrayed in the Russian's well worn and light gray cloak.

This last task proved very difficult—for it is no easy matter to put soaking wet clothes on an unconscious man—but Masloff finally completed it and surveyed his work with satisfaction. Both men wore of the same size and build, and the attire of each fitted the other perfectly. The contents of the pockets remained unchanged with the exception of Masloff's pistol, which he placed on his own person. He had in addition Donald's watch and chain, and a pocket containing bank notes, letters of credit, and what was of more value than all, the latter's passport.

Masloff next examined his victim's leather traveling bag, which held only clothes, toilet articles, and a bunch of letters and papers.

Then, after applying the chloroformed handkerchief a second time, he lifted Donald in his strong arms and placed him inside the carriage in an upright position. He closed the door and picked up the traveling bag.

"Safe for the present," he said aloud as he glanced up and down the street. "And now for a temporary hiding place. No time to lose for Berlin will soon visit in the morning. If things turn out as I think they will, I can safely take that train. It is even possible that I can recover back to St. Petersburg. This has been a strange night's adventure. To think that I should meet that man here—and that he should be the master of my long time to find the Hotel Moscow—thanks to that Pedestrian's last words—just I thought by there now."

He looked the horse into the shafts, mounted the broken harness as well as he was able, and in a short time the carriage was rattling over the stony gravel toward the lights of Wilhelm.

The Russian was thoroughly sober now. He drove in and out through the narrow streets and finally turned into a broader thoroughfare and drove up before a gloomy building of painted brick. A bright light streamed from the windows on the ground floor, and on the glass transom over the door were these words:

HOTEL MOSCOW.

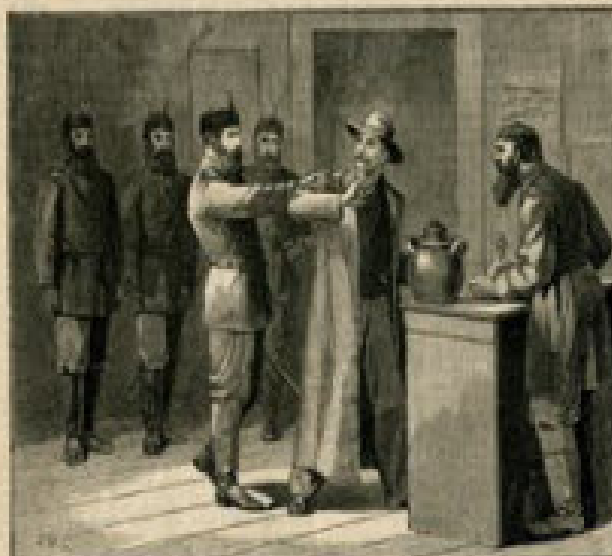

The driver sprang from his seat and opened the carriage door.

"Here you are at last," he called out cheerily. "Hotel Moscow, your honor."

The next instant he rolled back in amazement as Donald stepped lightly out and greeted his way across the pavement. The effect of the drug was just passing off and he did not as yet realize what had happened. He looked up at the hotel and then turned to the amazed driver.

"Where is my—my watch?" he demanded stupidly. "And how did my clothes get wet? This is the Hotel Moscow, is it? All right, I'm sleepy and want to go to bed. Tell me how much I owe you, and I'll give you the money at once."

The Russian looked at Donald with a white, scared face. Was this man in the wet clothes and gray cloak the same kindly old gentleman whom he escape? It is wonderful, and it will be more wonderful still if he fails to prove his identity and explain in my place. That is hardly possible, though—and yet strange things have happened. Well, it will be so much the better for you."

With a gleam at the carriage and a quick survey of the long gloomy street, Serge Masloff hurried away in the direction of the town and was soon out of sight.

Scarcely five minutes later the driver returned, leading the runaway horse, which he had succeeded in catching. At first he believed that his passenger had become tired of waiting and gone away, but when he peeped through the carriage door he saw Donald leaning back in the seat. He called several times but received no response.

"The poor fellow has gone to sleep," he muttered. "And little wonder at it. It's taking me a long time to find the Hotel Moscow—thanks to that Pedestrian's last words—just I thought by there now."

A sudden suspicion of foul play and of the probable result to himself flashed into the driver's mind. He glanced up and down the street. It was empty. No one had seen the carriage arrive. His only escape from a bad scrape was in immediate flight.

"It isn't matter about the money," he whispered excitedly to Donald. "You can pay it again. There is the hotel—just in front of you." Then he mounted the box, drove furiously down the street, and vanished around the first corner.

Donald looked helplessly after the departing vehicle, and then walked aimlessly across the pavement. The name of the hotel caught his eye, and he opened the door and stepped in.

IN A SOUTH AMERICAN JUNGLE.

By OWEN HACKETT.

FOUR men were clustered around a squat fire at which a large water fowl was roasting on the spit. A Brazilian jungle was the scene, bordering one of the great streams of the South American continent.

The men, who appeared to be Spaniards by their features, were singularly silent over their evening meal in the early dawn. Their countenances seemed dejected, their appetites dull. Something was wrong.

At last, one who had been picking at the leg of the bird fresh from the fire, suddenly tossed the half devoured bone into the pool on the border of which they were reclining and exclaimed:

"I dreamed of it, last night!"

His companions turned their eyes toward him and one asked indifferently:

"What?"

"That sunset of the river, that cayman who seems to haunt us like a fate—"

"But I maintain it is not a cayman as you think, Pedro," broke in another. "I do not know whether to think it a better or a worse omen, that by its great size it cannot but be a jaguar which, as you know, is not thought to be as savage or voracious as its smaller brother, the cayman."

"Be it cayman or jaguar, the word is no great matter nor do I fear any beast of its kind," responded Pedro, involuntarily placing his hand on the butt of the magazine rifle beside him. "But it is a bad omen, Garcia, that this ugly twenty foot monster should have followed us for three days. And do you note how he has always thrust his ugly snout, with its dull gray eyes, out of the water at us just as we have been sitting down at meals?"

Instantly each cast a sudden look toward the reed fringed pool and then glanced rather sheepishly at the others to see if his signs of fear had been noted. Each except one who had been but an indifferent listener, and whose, tall wiry frame, his air of easy repose, and his keen and watchfully observing eye gave him an air of dignity and command.

At this point he shifted his position and seemed about to speak, when the supercilious Pedro continued:

"Let him be as gentle as a lamb, say I, but the sight of his scaly body is a poor grace before meals. It takes my appetite away, I confess; and how can a man live and work without—"

"Enough!" said the leader, rising impatiently from the ground and disclosing fully six feet of height, a broad chest and shoulders and, by the manner of his action, great bodily strength. "Let us hear no more of this foolish talk. The river abounds with the cayman and the jaguar. You have seen three of them—"

"But, senior," put in the third member of the party, who had not yet spoken, "I saw his tail sweep through the water when he paid us his first visit twenty miles down the river; and again last evening as he splashed into the stream from this very spot I saw that same long tail again—both times with a sick as big as my hand in the fleshy part near the tip as if a part had been torn out."

"It is the same if you will, Antonio. What then?" responded the senior. "He smelt our supper three nights ago. Evidently, he knows good living when he smells it," and the senior's eye twinkled. "What wonder then that he follows us? Has he not always disappeared at our least movement?" Here Pedro impatiently shrugged his shoulders, but respect for his leader kept him silent.

THE CHURCH IN THE VILLAGE.

"Hullo, Duncan Woodward!" I called out.

"What are you doing in Willow Grove by yourself?"

"None of your business, Roger Strong," replied the only son of the wealthiest merchant in Fairville.

"You are stealing her goods," I went on.

"No such thing."

"But you are. Your pockets are full of them."

"See here, Roger Strong, just you asked your own headpiece and leave me alone."

"I am minding my business," I explained warmly.

"Indeed?" And Duncan put as much of a cover as was possible in the word.

"Yes, indeed. Willow Grove pays me for taking care of her orchard, and that includes keeping an eye on those pear trees, and I approached the tree upon the lowest branch of which Duncan was standing."

"If you job!" You think you're mighty big!" he muttered, as he jumped to the ground.

"No, I don't, Duncan."

"Yes, you do. What right has a fellow like you to talk to me in this manner? You are getting too big for your boots."

"I don't think so. I'm guarding this property and I want you to hand over what you've taken and leave the premises."

I returned, for I did not fancy the style in which I was being addressed.

"Dude! Do you expect me to pay any attention to that?"

"Yes, I do."

"Well, I won't."

"You had better, Duncan. If you don't, you may get into trouble."

"Who'll put me into trouble—you?"

"No, you'll get yourself."

"I suppose you intend to tell the widow what I've done."

"I certainly shall; unless you do as I've told you to."

Duncan bit his lip.

"How do you know that what the widow said I would have the goods?" he ventured.

"If she did it's all right," I returned, astonished, not so much over the fact that Willow Grove had granted the permission, as that such a high-toned young gentleman as Duncan Woodward should desire that privilege.

"You're no business to jump at conclusions," he added sharply.

"If I judged you wrongly, I beg your pardon."

Duncan. "I'll speak to the widow about it."

gloating reference, he had grown up, upward in the extreme.

He was a tall, well-built fellow, strong from constant athletic exercise, and given, on this account, to having his way among his associates.

Yet I was not afraid of him. Indeed, to tell the plain truth, I was not afraid of any one. For eight years I had been elected in life from pillar to post, until now death had no terrors for me.

Both of my parents were dead to me. My mother died when I was but five years old. She was of a delicate nature, and, strange as it may seem, I am inclined to believe that it was for the best that her death occurred when it did. The reason I believe this is because she was then spread the diagram that came upon our family several years later.

At her death my father was employed as head clerk by the firm of Holland & Mack, wholesale provision merchants of Newark, which was but a few miles from Fairville.

We occupied a handsome house in the center of the village. Our family besides my parents and myself contained but one other member—my sister Kate, who was several years my senior.

When our beloved mother died Kate took the management of our home upon her shoulders, and as she had learned, during my mother's long illness, how everything should be done, our domestic affairs ran smoothly. At this time I attended the Fairville school, and was laying the foundation for a commercial education by reading at even later day to follow in the footsteps of my father.

Two years passed, and then my father's manner changed. From being bright and cheerful towards us he became morose and silent. What the cause was I could not guess, and it did not help matters any to be told by Duncan Woodward, whose father was also employed by Holland & Mack, that "some folks would soon learn what was what, and no mistake."

At length the thrasher's bill. Returning from school one day I found Kate in tears.

"Oh, Roger!" she burst out. "They say father has stolen money from Holland & Mack, and they have just arrested him for a thief!"

The blow was a terrible one. I was but a boy of fourteen, and the news completely bewildered me. I put on my cap, and together with Kate, took the first train to Newark to find out what it all meant.

We found my father in jail, where he had been

"FIRST OF ALL, I WANT YOU TO GET DOWN ON YOUR KNEES AND PRAY FOR US IN YOUR COMMON SENSE MANNER."

I began to move off towards the house. Duncan hurried after me and caught me by the arm.

"You find you, when do you mean?" he demanded.

"I'm going to that out if you are telling the truth."

"Isn't my word enough?"

"It will do us harm to ask," I replied coolly, not caring to pick a quarrel, and yet morally sure that he was prevaricating.

"Do you think I'm telling you a lie? I've a good mind to give you a sound drubbing," he cried, angrily.

Duncan Woodward had many of the traits of a bully about him. He was the only son of a well-to-do who nearly ruined him, and, lacking a mother's

THE COSSACK'S GUILD.

THE man was none other than Pierre Valbert, the one armed convict who had escaped so daringly from the Tomsk prison a few months before. Little wonder that Donald was surprised to find him here, a thousand miles from Tomsk? Who had he not fled toward Russia, as was his stated intention?

Valbert came forward with outstretched hand.

"Ah, my good fellow, we meet again," he exclaimed. "But this time under happier circumstances. You are one of us, I know, so come along and we will take care of you."

Donald made no reply, not knowing indeed what to say of him to regard this doubtful freedom that was offered him.

But Valbert was in too much haste to wait or expect an answer. He passed on to join his companions, who were waiting among the pine arboreal prisoners, and picking out—on Donald readily perceived—those among them who had been concerned in the plot which gave Valbert his liberty and caused the death of Leontel.

Two of Valbert's companions Donald recognized as Leontel and Grem, the men who had escaped on the previous day. Others were of the same stamp and escaped convicts beyond a doubt.

The unexpected affair threw Donald into a whirl of perplexity. His heart leaped at the thought of freedom, and yet even on such terms he felt reluctant to join this band of assassins. The conversation overheard that night between the starvants and one of the Cossacks gave him a clue to the situation, and he shrewdly guessed that the perpetrators of these outrages were Valbert and his companions, who had formed themselves into a band and found a safe hiding place in the mountain fastnesses near by. The assault on the post station was equally clear. These clever rascals must have been lying in wait for the exile party, having learned from Leontel and Grem that they were approaching. They made short work of General Tshinistoff and his party—who probably blundered into the ambush—and when the latter escaped they divided into two bands, one of which fled into the mountains with the young girl, while the other, knowing that General Tshinistoff would shortly return to the scene with the Cossacks and thus leave the prisoners without sufficient escort, made a detour through the forest and stormed the post station in the manner already shown.

This at least was the theory that presented itself in Donald's mind, and subsequent events proved and sustained had come to his senses and crawled away.

Valbert bent over the Cossack like an instant.

"They are not badly wounded," he said. "With care they may recover."

"Poor Tolstoy!" he added, stopping in front of the third man. "He is stone dead. Well, if we have lost one companion, we have gained eight—that should make us."

They pressed on, drawing the gates shut behind them, and then paused for a moment to listen.

All was quiet, so they marched down the post road for a hundred yards or more, and then turned aside into the ditch forest on the left.

Valbert led the way, with Leontel and Grem close behind him. They were well armed and carried their weapons in readiness for instant use. Donald came next, and then the rest in single file. All night long they pushed on over the frozen snow crust, going deeper and deeper into the mountains and leaving hundreds of footprints. When daylight came they stopped for a brief rest, not that the march was resumed, but with weary and lagging feet, for no food was to be had and the want of it made the next week.

We will leave Donald and his companions to pursue their journey through the Siberian forest, and take the reader for a brief time to the city of Irkutsk.

The assault on General Tshinistoff and the abduction of his daughter was flashed over the wires within three hours of its occurrence, and the daring affair caused the greatest excitement in the social and military circles of Irkutsk.

On the evening of the following day Captain Andre Ingmar was accompanied by special messenger to headquarters, and a few moments later he was galloping along the crowded Kuznetsk—the main street of the city. He found Colonel Isakkin alone in his gloomy apartment, sitting before a large flat table which was littered with papers and lighted by a pair of wax candles.

"Well," said the colonel abruptly as Andre entered, "you have heard the news of course."

"Yes," replied Andre. "It is known from one end of the town to the other."

He looked respectfully in front of the table, wondering vaguely if his urgent summons was connected with this affair.

THE ONLY APPARENT OCCURRENCE OF THE NIGHT WHEN TWO BROTHERS SPOKE.

him to be right, with the single exception, that the attack on the governor of Irkutsk was premeditated.

"Come on now! We are ready to go!" Valbert's harsh voice broke in on Donald's reflections and warned him that he must decide quickly what to do.

There was really no choice. His lack of interest in the matter had already excited the suspicion of Valbert's comrades, and they regarded Donald with silent, mistrustful glances. He knew he too much to be left behind.

Donald hesitated briefly and then followed the party—now augmented by ten or twelve men—toward the gates. Many of the exiles pressed on their heels clamoring pleadingly to be taken along, but by Valbert's orders they were sternly driven back. In front of the gates lay the three men who had been shot. The one who was knocked down

AN IDEA AND A FORTUNE.

BY JOHN BARKER.

WITH their backs toward Placer Natch two young men of about twenty one, burdened with prospectors' kits, came slowly down the trail. The well worn way ran beside the rocky stream that for twenty five years had run through the claims of the Placer Natch Mining Company's claim, which, singularly, included in their line across the only paying claims that had ever been staked in McCosman's Pan.

As the young prospectors moved, Ned Brent's supply depot at the head of the pass, the latter heard the silence, and said moodily:

"I wish I had known three months ago as much as I know now."

"Three months ago, Tom, we both knew what we had to expect; that was all talked over."

"Well, it's one thing to see hardship and failure at a distance, but it's another thing to go through them. I don't know then, as I do now, what real hardship was. I thought I did. Harder than on a farm seemed about as near slavery as we could find in a free country."

"Our experience is not unusual, Tom. We may succeed yet—we may not. I am going to stick it out another month and so are you."

"I'm not so sure of that," interrupted Tom.

"You are well, if I know you, Tom, and I guess I do. You like to have your little ground now and then, and I'm glad you do; it makes the arduous on the bright side, and so we see the pleasant features and the hopeful prospects."

"It's a pity neither don't sell in the market, Phil; you'd be pretty well off if they did."

"Come, now! none of your sarcasms, old man. I tell you we are going to stick to this for a month yet. We have no money, it is true; but we can work our way, and we are free and are seeing the world. That beats eighteen hours a day on farm work."

The trail here ran close to the edge of the stream and about a foot above it. Phil Gossard the hopeful, happened to step on a loose stone; it gave way and down went his right leg into the water.

"I like that!" he exclaimed in vexation, as he pulled his free one with much difficulty. He regarded his shoe with surprise on seeing it covered to the top with soft mud. He sat down on a log and squandered the water out of his trousers laughing all the while at the muddy shoe in a reversion that attracted Tom Duverson's attention.

"What's up?" he asked.

"I was trying to account for such deep mud in the bed of a mountain stream. I am certain this mud is the year's deposit of the dirt that is separated and out and wash it till December without getting enough to keep his pipe slight from year to year. But just fancy how many millions must have passed down this stream! You heard what the river and up to the North-western per cent of the gold product was washed away from the claims. If they have panned out fifty million dollars there, that would make ten millions swept away into the big river below, with more considerable going the same way."

"That's all very well in theory, but what does it amount to in any way? We can't get hold of any of these millions."

"No, of course not. But this I do believe: if any one could afford to turn this stream into a reservoir and wait ten years he would have enough gold left to make in a wholesale sort of way that would pay. It would only be a question of devising a cheap system of washing the dirt from the gold more thoroughly than they do at the mines. I'd take the contract to convert the process, too. But come! We won't waste any more time over it. No one is going to wait ten years to get his good money back."

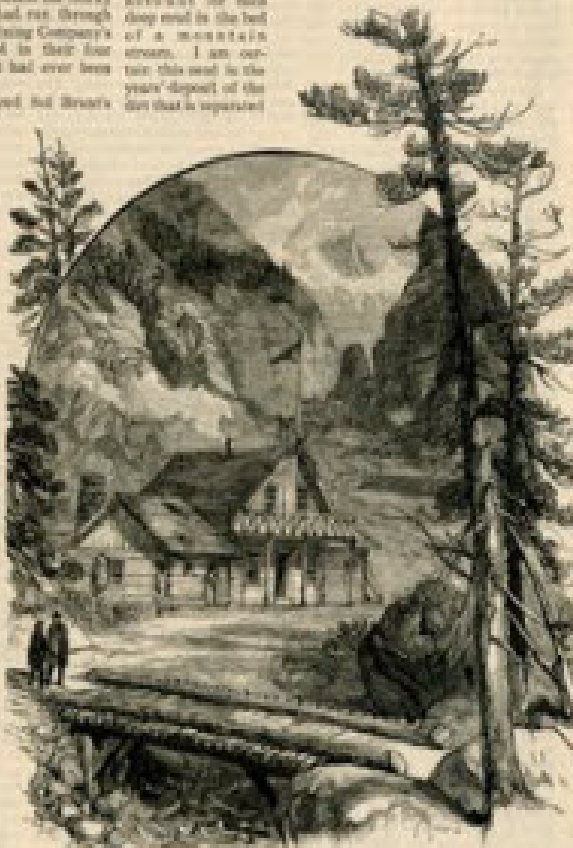

They took up their journey again, and had not walked ten minutes when a horse in the trail and the stream brought them in sight of the tidy establishment of Ned Brent. He was one of those who came into the hills with the rush when gold was discovered, but had soon discovered his fortune in trade while others trumped the hills for paying claims. Those who thus went into business invariably had a more fortunate future than. Ned's place had grown up from a shanty store to a tidy house that in time had received additions, making it a very comfortable establishment. The trail had been much used in the past, but besides what he made out of the usual traffic over it, he supplied all the Placer Natch wants by contract, and turned a pretty penny out of it, too.

No man had ever come into sight of Ned Brent's while the men was up and failed to find the Star Spangled Banner flying at the staff head.

Ned's fifty wife came out to meet the boys, closely followed by the trader himself.

Phil was spokesman.

"Mr. Brent, this is my partner, Tom Duverson; my name is Phil Gossard. We've been in the hills from the gold in the claims above at Placer Natch."

"Well, what of it?"

"It simply flashes across me that this dirt mud is very rich in the waste gold that is washed out with the dirt from the claims."

"Are you thinking of making out a mad claim?"

"Not quite as bad as that. A man might sweep

BLAZING ARROW. A TALK OF THE FRONTIER.

By EDWARD A. MANN,
Author of "Boy Pioneer Series," "Dorothy Series," Etc.

CHAPTER I. ON THE TRAIL.

THE distance between the frontier settlement of Tipson, in Kentucky, and the black house, stretched two miles before our story opens, was precisely fifty miles, and along the trail connecting the two, a couple of boys were intensely making their way one early afternoon.

Highland Edwards had his home in Tipson. His family included his wife, his only son, Wharton, aged seventeen, and an Irish youth, Larry Murphy, a year older. They had lived originally in western Pennsylvania, where Larry was left to the care and kindness of the well-to-do settler who had been one of the best friends his Irish laboring man ever knew. The mother of the boy died in his infancy, so that he was an orphan without any near relatives.

Mr. Edwards was among the prominent citizens of Tipson, where he had dwelt for nearly three years, when he and his wife decided to start some old friends that had settled in a larger town about a hundred miles farther east. In order to do so they mounted their ponies and followed the well marked trail, crossing several streams and mountainous sections, and running considerable danger from the Indians, who, in those days, were nearly always hostile.

It was agreed between the parents and the boys that they should meet, on the return of the former, at the black house, and make the rest of the journey together. Mr. Edwards died on the night of August as the date of his arrival at the post. The boys were to reach the black house no later than that date, and no sooner than the day before. The parents promised to wait twenty-four hours for them, if necessary, and then, in the event of their not showing up, they would continue their journey homeward. The trail was so plain and the route so well known that it was easy to make accurate calculations, and to figure the time within a very few hours, when the respective parties were due at the black house, the figuring of course, being based on the supposition that no accident befall any one concerned.

The boys had covered about two-thirds of the distance between the settlement and the meeting point without the slightest incident occurring. They scattered along chatting or laughing, for their start from Tipson had been made in time to remove all need of haste, as they were in high spirits.

By way of preliminary, one peculiarity of young Edwards must be named; he was the fastest youth such high authority, came a general desire to see the two champions pitted against each other, and efforts were made to bring about such a contest.

The great difficulty in the way was that the Shawanese was one of the most vicious and treacherous members of his tribe. He had committed so many crimes against the whites that he dared to trust himself in their power, and refused to come to the settlement, despite the urgent invitations of the leading pioneers.

He was persuaded, however, to venture out of the woods one day, and the arrangements were quickly made for a race between him and young Edwards. Before the trial came off some one gave the Shawanese a draught of "the water" which renewed the sleeping demon in him. Whipping out his knife he started his war whoop and charged furiously upon the astounded youth, with the intention of slaying him.

Wharton naturally had no weapon with him, but succeeded in eluding the movement, and, before the warlike captives could seize him he darted into the woods with a dash about and disappeared.

Kathie curiously as the youths walked along the trail in the direction of the black house, they fell to discussing this affair.

"I never saw nothing," said Larry, "than when that race didn't come off, except when—when Blazing Arrow wasn't caught. I'm sure you would have beaten him out of sight."

"I don't know about that," modestly replied Wharton. "Blazing Arrow is a well known."

"Which doesn't signify you wouldn't beat him at all. I wonder whether you'll ever learn that man out between you?"

"There's no saying. He isn't likely to show himself in the settlement again, but who knows that we won't meet before we reach the black house? The runner who came to the settlement the other day said the Shawanese and Wyandots are on the war path again, and we are going to have trouble with them."

"And when ain't they on the war path?" was the retort of the disgraced Larry, "but I'm hoping the folks will get home safely."

"I have been worried more than I dare tell; we have seen nothing of the Indians so far, but that is no proof that we shall not do so."

As if in confirmation of this fear, the boys were on the frontier. Imagine the fact that he was but a boy, and that he had engaged in many exciting contests, he had never yet met any one whom he failed to conquer with ease.

When the Indians were not so hostile toward the whites as they were at the time of which we are writing, they occasionally visited the black house and settlements for the purpose of barter or to engage in friendly contests in shooting, laughing and running. The red men were so trained from infancy to this kind of amusement that they were experts, and held their own well against the pioneers, though it is well known that the Caucasians race, under similar surroundings and circumstances, surpasses all others in physical as well as in mental attainments.

Among the warlike Shawanese was the famous Blazing Arrow, who claimed to have beaten every one in running that dared to contest his supremacy. Following the declaration, therefore, from FEODOR.

THE YOUNG MILLER OF THE CAUCASUS.

By HENRI DE VILLE.

THIRTEEN people of the hamlet asked what was to become of Feodor and Catharina when their father, the miller, died. But when Nicholas Chelodnicki, who secretly thought to step in and take possession of the little mill himself, now that there was no father, struggled up the ravine the day after the father had been laid to rest, he found the sixteen-year-old Feodor awaiting him at the doorway, covered with the white dust of the grain, the wheel, as of yore, creaked painfully, and the millstones laboriously ground the corn from the sacks that had been waiting since old Ivan had been stricken with his sudden and short-lived illness; the clatter of parties, also, betokened that the tiny housewife was busily at work with her accustomed duties, and everything seemed to be going on as regularly and with such order that it was with a doubtful falter and a startled look that Nicholas extended his half-haunted and by no means disinterested invitation to these more children to come and abide in the rude house of himself and wife with their already numerous family.

"But as we are, it is our duty to offer shelter to the weak and homeless; though it would be hard for me to leave my flock and my fields to look after the mill."

"But we are strong, good Nicholas," cried little Catharina, "and we are not homeless, for this house, though not so large, is quite as good as your own," and she said this with an air of dignity and pride almost laughable, coming from one so young.

"And while I thank you for your consideration in offering to take charge of the mill," said Feodor with politeness, but also a look that showed Nicholas he had not pulled any wool over those sharp eyes. "I will wait before accepting to see how I manage myself." Then he proceeded to measure out the other's corn, putting the wood ricks aside for himself as miller. And Nicholas did not scruple to purchase of the homely maid of those "weak and homeless" ones to whom he had offered a corner of his house in exchange for the mill that had caused the owner to be regarded wealthy, as wealthy you is that impoverished hamlet.

When the inhabitants of the hamlet came on the stream below heard of Feodor's decision to take his father's place as miller, they opened their eyes in astonishment and wagged their unsharpened heads in dubious prophecy; for Feodor, who had always been silent and steady, and not given to the prevailing habit of speaking more words about nothing, was considered to be more or less of a hothead perhaps; but then there was an old hand or two that discovered in him thoughtfulness rather than shallowness, and did not altogether doubt the ways had in that lost spot, where their poor and rude people, illiterate and slow-minded, collected with primitive implements their little crops of farm land along the clearings on the bank of the stream, and fed their worst flocks of sheep and goats on the wild hillside.

It was a rugged Caucasian landscape, this, the prospect was that of dense, forest-covered mountains, with bare, rock-strewn summits, covered now and then in the year with deep snow; even at the end of the summer the traveler could find in every

CHAPTER VIII.

TURNING BACK.

IT is singular how in the most critical moments certain thoughts will intrude themselves.

While Wharton lay, words were passing over the ravine and wondering whether Blazing Arrow had vanished, a sudden suspicion came to him to raise his rifle and examine its lock.

There was not a grain of powder in the pan, and no charge in the barrel!

All the time that it had been in the hands of the Shawanese and himself it was as motionless as a stick. It seemed incredible that such should have been the fact, and yet here was the evidence before his own eyes.

What was equally apparent and more astonishing was that Blazing Arrow must have been unconscious of the truth. The youth had not reached the weapon after firing the last shot, and it was, therefore, empty when he fired it across the ravine, preparatory to making his leap. It had been picked up by the runner, who failed, in the excitement, to notice the oversight; taking it for granted that it was ready for use. In the rush at the pursuit, he had no chance of examining it, and, when he recovered his senses, the gun was in the hands of its owner.

But had the Shawanese known the truth, when the lad stood, within a few paces defying him, his pretended weakness would have gone in a flash, and, trembling to his feet, he would have leaped upon his antagonist like a panther.

"That's the strangest thing I ever knew," exclaimed Wharton, with a shudder at his inexplicable escape; "I can't understand how he and I missed seeing it."

When it is remembered that the fact of an old fashioned flintlock being unchanged in principle at a glance, the feature of the mistake is the more remarkable.

The discovery threw the youth into something of a panic. He felt as if the venomous old man was about to assail him from among the trees, and, with a quick glance around, made desperate haste to reload the gun. Not until the ball was rammed down the barrel, and the powder was in the pan did he breathe freely.

"There!" he exclaimed, drawing a sigh of relief, "when I made that blunder again, I deserve to be shot, but the laugh is on Blazing Arrow now, and on me."

Now that he had a trusty weapon in his possession, and the Shawanese had none, the situation of the latter was like that of a wild beast and a sportsman. Could the beast keep its paw upon the

When he stood clear of the trees and beyond reach of any sudden surprise, he breathed freely for the first time.

"Now, let him come, if he wants to. I can outrun him any way, but I don't run any more races," added Wharton, glancing down at his gun.

The Shawanese, who was doubtless glaring at him from some point of concealment, must have noted upon coming to within his victim.

"I wonder what sort of yarn he will tell his people when he goes back," mused Wharton. "How will he account for his failure to capture me, and what explanation will he give for the loss of my gun? I suppose he will say he concluded to shoot me and bring it over my head and bring it away. But if I come out of this trouble, they will learn the truth some day."

Not forgetting to be on his guard against his foe, the lad walked slowly across the clearing, taking the back trail. He was considering the best thing to do.

But for Larry Murphy, he would have made all haste in the opposite direction. The black house was almost twenty miles away, and the ferry had delayed the couple so long that there was no time to spare. Wharton's parents would become anxious and set out to meet the boys. If they should become involved with these Indians, direful consequences were likely to follow.

But Wharton could not desert his comrades. His was a mile or two away, near the main party of warriors, and Providence alone could prevent his falling into their hands. Larry would naturally suppose that his friend was not far from him, and it would be just like the fellow to try to save the worst sort of peril in the hope of doing him service.

"I must get back to him as soon as I can. If he could only know how fortunate I have been, it would be easy for him to stand around the whole party and join me here. Then we would be sure and traveling and be at the blackhouse before sunrise tomorrow."

Since, however, such a state of affairs was out of the question, Wharton had only to face matters as they were.

One ground for hope cheered him. The early summer afternoon was drawing to a close and night was at hand. He could maneuver in the darkness much better than when the sun was shining. He and the bird had had a system of calls and signals by which they communicated when within hearing sportsman to could overcome him, but the latter had only to maintain his watchfulness.

Had Blazing Arrow reached toward the lad, after he had found his gun was empty and before he reloaded it, Wharton's only resource would have been to take again to his heels; for, active and athletic as he was, he could not possibly be a match for the powerful, full grown warrior, and it would have been foolhardy on his part to take any such risk.

The disappearance of the Shawanese during the brief absence of Wharton, was proof that the wily wretch was shamming. His fall had given him a severe shock, but no bones were broken; and, had the youth heeded the request to help him to rise, he would have snatched him off his feet in a twinkling and held him at his mercy.

Whether had he gone? The dread that he might be snatching among the trees in the effort to surprise him, caused young Edwards to make a hasty withdrawal from the wood to the open plain which had been the scene of the recent race of his life.

A SPLIT IN THE CLUB;

RALPH MORTON'S MUTINY.

BY EDGAR A. MORTON, JR.

CHAPTER I.

RALPH MORTON AND THE SPURLOCK'S YACHT CLUB.

"I'm going to be a sailor,
A sailor bold and true,
To fight for my dear country
On the deck and deep blue sea."

"I'm going to be a sailor,
To roam beside the moon,
To watch the sailing of the ships,
And hear the tempest's roar."

"I'm going to be a sailor,
To visit distant lands,
To see the East, of wild romance,
And stand on foreign sands."

Strong Ralph Morton, a young fellow nineteen years of age, dressed in a dainty costume which was a cross between that of a Marine dandy, a Texas cowboy and a United States naval officer, as he strolled out on the veranda of the club house and threw himself into a hammock hanging there.

Though he was sleeping, his looks and actions seemed to indicate that he was in a particularly disgusted frame of mind. An expression of discontent rested on his face, and he did not deign to notice, by word or look, the half dozen or more other young fellows who were lounging, in various attitudes, in chairs and on the railing of the veranda.

Ralph possessed a far from meditative eye, which was probably the reason he indulged in vocal music when anything occurred to "rattle his business"; he thereby made his companions painfully aware of his discontent. He passed a moment, after he had completed the third stanza of his song, to settle himself comfortably in the swinging couch. Then significant glances were exchanged between them on the porch, a deep groan went up, and Brandon Morton said:

"Give that tall fellow rope!"

"Does his mamma know he's out?" asked Rex Grantly, in seriously volitional tones.

"Papa takes the baby, don't you hear the little dear?" sang Frank Massey.

Ralph took no notice of these glances, but, pulling his white handkerchief full over his eyes, continued in even louder tones:

"I'm going to be a sailor,
A hero's name to me
By daring deeds of glory
And the battle's din."

"I'm going to be a sailor,
To hear the roar of guns,
To hear the shouts of victory
On Cuba's battle-flags wave."

"I'm going to be a sailor,
My war cry then shall be
For honor, death or glory,
And my country's victory."

"That's all very fine when you're singing about it, Ralph, but the reality hasn't so much music in it," laughed Brandon Morton, when the song was ended.

"I'll tell you what's the matter, though, there would be plenty of music of another kind, but of course you couldn't enjoy anything in which there was any excitement, and the rest of the club are no better," growled Ralph, without changing his position, or raising his hat from his face.

"If we are to get our excitement by running the chance of being blown out of the water, shot as pirates, or put in a hellish prison, then we de-

"Look here, Ralph Morton, you know we're nothing of the kind," exclaimed Brandon impatiently; "and you're only to remember what we went through the last time we were mixed up with those Cubans, when there were no hostilities, to tell you what we expect now in a time of actual war."

"I beg your pardon, Brandon, perhaps you're right, but I tell you I just wish it was so old Spain was fighting. Wouldn't we give the Don a jolly thrashing?"

"What with? Our elegant navy of cotton ships and antiquated guns?" laughed Brandon.

"BUT WHY DON'T YOU SAY YOU'RE ALL OVERHAUL AND MORTON AND THAT YOU'RE AFRAID YOU'LL BEAR A BACK UP JOB?"

cidedly wouldn't enjoy it," responded Brandon emphatically.

"Oh, please! there's no danger of such a thing; they wouldn't dare to interrupt us."

"I suppose you have heard of the case of the Virginia, haven't you? That shows what they would dare do," called Brandon.

"Yes, of course; but that wouldn't likely happen again. I've been consulting on our making this cruise to the Bahamas, and nothing else will satisfy us," replied Ralph doggedly.

"Then you will have to go alone, for I and the rest of the club have fully decided that there is too much real fighting going on in and about Cuba at present to make it healthy for us to venture anywhere near the island."

"Why don't you say you're all remarks and notions, and that you're afraid you'll bear a gun go-off, and be done with it?" cried Ralph, in withering tones, raising himself to a sitting position in the hammock.

"Yes, and I'll be only too happy to go in one. I believe I'd lend those Cubans a hand if I had a chance."

"You'll not get the chance, Ralph, as you might as well content yourself and fall in with our plans."

"I might have had, though, if you had held out to go to the Bahamas, as we planned last year."

"There you are again, back to where you started from. It's useless to think of such a thing."

"Well, you'll have to give a fellow time to get around to your way of thinking, for it's hard to give it up."

Ralph settled himself back in the hammock again, and turned his face seaward, apparently satisfied to yield his desires to the majority, while Brandon turned on his heel and entered the club house.

The young fellows whom we have so unceremoniously introduced to the reader were all between the ages of seventeen and twenty-one, and members of the Spurlock's Yacht Club. Three of them, Brandon Morton, Ralph Morton and Rex Grantly

ON BOARD THE ULYSSES.

"WHAT do you make it now, Fluster?"
"Latitude 28 deg. 30 min. 5 sec., longitude 89 deg. 5 min. 3 sec."

Fluster Fulwood, mate of the steam yacht Ulysses, a young man between nineteen and twenty, was seated at a table in the forward cabin. He had just completed his calculations for latitude and longitude, and announced the result as above to Randolph Raymond, captain and owner of the vessel, who was standing at the foot of the cabin steps. The mate then began writing a parallel ruler on a chart of the southern coast of Texas.

"What is the course?" asked the young captain.

"Wait a minute till I work the variation," replied Fluster. "Now we have it—north-north-west half north."

"North-north-west half north," repeated the captain to a messenger at the top of the stairs, who was waiting for the information and was to convey it to the quarter-master.

"We have done very well; our day's run is ten miles, which is an average of six knots an hour," added the mate.

"That is doing splendidly, considering the heavy weather we have had since we left the Cape of Florida; but where are we now?"

"About forty miles due south of Matagorda Bay."

"Then we ought to sight the headlands at Morton's Cove within a few hours," concluded the young captain, as he turned and went up the steps.

The mate continued his work at the cabin table by writing in his log book.

With the usual privilege of an author, we have allowed these two characters to introduce themselves to the reader, but while the mate is busy with his record, and the young master and owner has gone to inquire how dinner is progressing, we will tell the reader something more about them.

Randolph Raymond, or Captain Andy as he was more often called, was a rich young man, and though he was worth at least a million in his own right, was unspoiled by the "mighty dollar." He had only just reached his majority and had come into his property a few months before we introduced him, and though two such momentous events in a young man's life, coming at the same time, might well be calculated to "puff him up," we are glad to say Andy had no pride of position or wealth, but was sensible and generous to an unusual degree.

The only extravagance he indulged in were things nautical in general, and his steam yacht, in particular, which, as we have already said, was nearly as large as an ocean steamer.

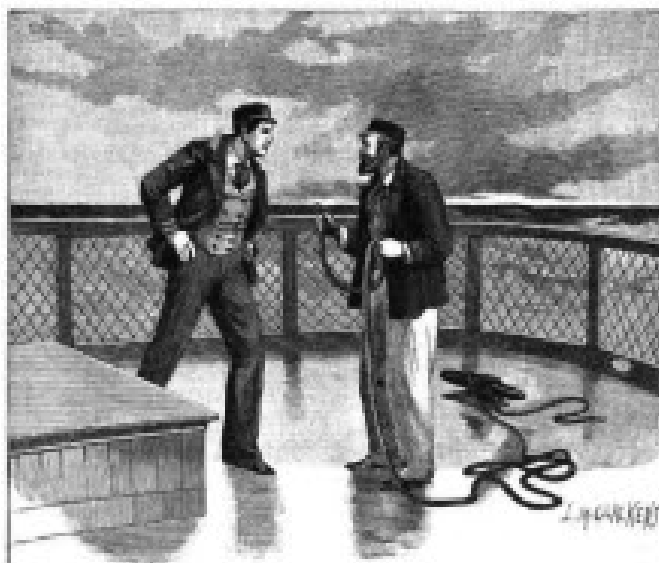

been called till he was advanced to the dignity of an officer of the yacht, was a sort of prodigy of Captain Andy's. The latter had found him, sleek and peaceful, walking the streets of New York, several years before, after a long and trying voyage to the East Indies, and had given him a position as cabin boy on the Ulysses. And when the mate of the yacht, who had been with her since she first went into commission, left, to accept a similar position on a transatlantic steamer, Fluster was installed in his place.

Though he had not the intelligence and experience of his predecessor when he assumed the position, Fluster had made a number of long voyages in all classes of vessels since the age of twelve, and possessed an aptness for learning and a soundness of judgment that were truly remarkable.

Judging from his speech at that time, one would have thought him truly illiterate, but he had really had a fair education and had acquired the fruits of grammar and pronunciation through carelessness and association with ignorant ship-mates before the mast. Under Captain Andy's direction and tuition, however, he quickly regained a correctness of speech, and advanced rapidly in the study of navigation. Every opportunity was given to him to carry the theory of the latter into practice, and that is the reason we found him figuring out the position and course of the yacht, which duty properly belongs to the sailing-master. He also kept a log book on his own account in addition to the official record of the voyage kept by the sailing-master.

Fluster's parents were dead, or at least he supposed they were, for he had no recollection of a father or mother; and there was no one in the world of any kin to him as far as he knew. The only beings he could remember, who were associated with his younger years, were a red-headed, freckled faced boy about his own age, and a village sort of woman whom he had called aunt (the boy's mother, from whom Fluster was compelled to flee by her cruelty and constant "tongue lashing," but he felt convinced that she was no more his aunt than she was his grandmother, and he was sure she was not old enough for the latter, and he had no pang at the parting. He had secured a berth as cabin boy with a kind-hearted skipper, and had continued to follow the sea ever since.

We are thus particular in speaking of the young

"IF THAT HOPE WAS SET OUT THROUGH BY SOME MIND INTENDENT I NEVER SAW ONE."

Over a year before, his uncle and guardian, (he had lost both of his parents when an infant,) had died, but on his death bed had revealed a skeleton in the family closet concerning his own son and Andy's cousin, who had been abducted by mistake when a few years old. After many complications, in the search for his lost cousin, Andy was led to Texas. And, as already stated, had found him after some sailing events, in which several members of the Sportsmen's Yacht Club took part.

He felt so grateful for this happy result, and found the young sportsman so congenial, that he joined the yacht club, and promised to visit them, if possible, each year. We have already told how he had further testified his interest in the organization by the presentation to it of the yacht Stars and Stripes.

FOX HUNTING AGAINST TIME.

BY WILLIAM J. BARBER.

"LOOK here!" exclaimed Charlie Stevens, holding his friend before an official looking peasant looked up on the walls of the Springdale post office.

"I've seen it," murmured Ed Lawrence.

"They're put up there posters all over the county and the fellows in Winfield want to match us at shooting boxes."

"This is the announcement that attracted their attention."

NOTICE.

In accordance with the several provisions of a statute enacted by the General Assembly, the disposition of certain surplus funds in the Treasury of Washington County will be made to match the statement of a public meeting. On and after this date (December 1), the sum of Five Dollars ($5.00) will be paid by the Treasurer for every fox head delivered to the order of the Lewis Stevens, Clerk.

"They want to wipe out all the foxes in the county," observed Lawrence.

"I see," replied young Stevens, "but what was this you said about a shooting match?"

"Why, a lot of Winfield sharpshooters challenged the fellows of our town to a fox hunting match. The rule that kills the most foxes wins, and the losers have to pay for a big winter supper."

"Of course Springdale will accept Winfield's challenge."

"Certainly; we told them we were ready for a match. That crowd can't lose. They couldn't hit a hare dead with a toy pistol," an expression of disgust appearing on the speaker's face.

"Talk's cheap; don't be too sure of that."

It was another speaker who uttered this last comment. As he spoke he turned from a desk where he had been writing and faced the other two.

"Oh, you're from Winfield," observed Ed Lawrence.

"Yes, I guess you fellows expect to have a walk over."

"I think we'll cut down the fox population considerably," answered the other quietly.

"How many have you caught so far?" asked the Springdale man curiously.

"We'll let you know two weeks from now."

Lawrence tried to conceal his chagrin at this response and said nothing.

"You'll want all you can get. Come on, Charlie; let's go up street."

As the two moved away, Ben Hinton, the Winfield hunter, gazed thoughtfully after them with his handsome dark eyes and meditated over the last words of his friend.

"He says we'll need all we can get," he thought. "I'm not afraid of him or the rest of the Springdale crowd when it comes to hunting foxes, but that Ed Lawrence is mean enough to do anything to win. I'll keep an eye on him and if he tries any tricks he'll get the worst of it."

His suspicions were not unfounded. When he rode out of Springdale on his way home he noticed Lawrence and his companion, Stevens, talking earnestly in a secluded part of the street, while they directed occasional glances at him that looked suspicious.

Could he have overheard what they were saying, he would have felt even more the necessity of keeping on his guard.

"What do you think of the scheme?" Lawrence was saying.

"It'll win the winter supper for us, sure," was Stevens' reply.

"Keep it under your hat, and don't say a word to any one. We'll make some extra money out of it and nobody'll be the wiser."

"I'm mean as an ox-trail. When will we go over to Dasher's?"

"Tomorrow night. He'll not be at home then. The road will be clear and we can look for the heads without danger."

"Where'll I meet you?"

"At the house about eight o'clock. We'll slip out of town together and cut across the fields to Dasher's. Be on hand, sure."

"You can count on me. I'm not throwing away my chance to take in five dollar bills."

Then they separated, each going his way.

Ed Lawrence as young Hinton had, normally observed, was not above doing a dishonorable deed to achieve certain results which would accrue to his personal gain. While not thoroughly reprehensible he was known to have been guilty of several acts that did not reflect any credit upon him.

THE STAR OF THE SHOW, And What She Found on Christmas Eve.

BY EDWIN HARRINGTON.

IT is the day before Christmas and a more sunshiny, soft—even warm—day could not be wished for. Warm! you ask. Yes, indeed! For we are in Consville and that pleasant little town in the middle of the piney woods of Georgia, where on Christmas and New Year's Days they raise the crackling log fire to get the ground wet with a warmth like a northern springtime.

And that accounts for the circus in the wide clearing on the edge of the town. Like the bird of passage it spreads its great white wings in the South when the chill of autumn begins to sweep down on the North.

Nearly all the boys and girls in town are standing in awe-struck wonder, watching the new band on the tackle that is drawing the center of the principal circus up to the top of the tall tent pole, with a collection "yoho, hee, yoho!" There is a great circle of wagons behind the main tent, all carefully painted—some like tiny houses with little windows and a little stove pipe for a chimney rising from the roof; and from the others, which are covered with huge pictures of horridous animals and are shot up tight except for little gratings near the top, there comes every little while a terrible roar that seems to shake the very ground.

Then one of the men begins to distribute among the host of children large purple handbills, which they all read as if they were food and drink for the hungry; and one of the boys suddenly darts away from the group and runs as hard as he can toward the next white cottage with the magnolias in the garden, standing just a little way up on the hill.

That is Bobby Burns, Junior, and the cottage belongs to Aunt Laura, who is Auntie to all the boys and girls in the town by virtue of her great love for all that is innocent and good. And so, you will always see the children running in and out of Aunt Laura's house.

Aunt Laura, who is a round-shouldered and cross-browed lady and even her house and lawn, has been working hard all the morning tidying things up, and then doing something very mysterious in her front parter, the door of which she has carefully locked on evening out. And now, being tired, she sits down to rest awhile and look over the county paper that has been waiting for hours.

But she is no sooner seated than a rascalish Bobby Burns, Junior, waving a purple poster in his hand and shouting:

"Auntie, Auntie, the circus has come! Haven't you seen it? It's down in the clearing. You can see it from the parlor window. Come, look!" and as Bobby springs to open the parlor door Aunt Laura rises in a fright; remembering, then, that she locked the door and has the key in her pocket, she resumes her seat and says shortly:

"The circus! humph! yes, I've seen it!"

"Why, Auntie, what's the matter?"

"I don't like the circus! It's an abominable situation for boys and girls—and young women."

"I'd like to know why," retorted Bobby. "I saw a circus once when I was North, and I thought it just the finest thing I ever saw in my whole life."

"Your whole life, eh! My stars!" and Aunt Laura stared over her spectacles at the fourteen-year-old.

"Say, didn't you like to go to the circus when you were young?" Bobby made a home thrust here. Aunt Laura winced; but, recovering herself, she answered with some asperity:

"Yes, I went! and you can't tell me anything about the circus, young gentleman! It's a degrading institution and the circus people are bad people. I know 'em! Didn't one of these show people run off with my father?"

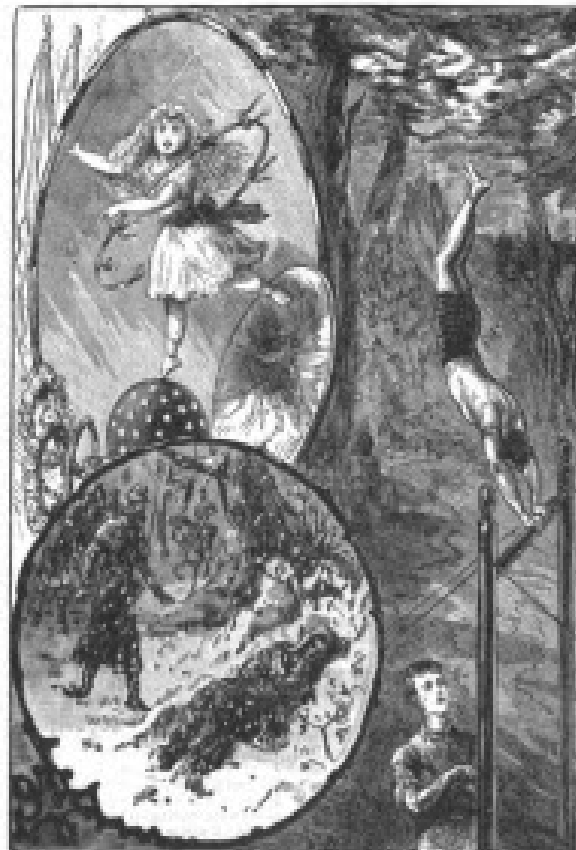

There! the secret was out. Years ago Aunt Laura had taken a pretty young girl from the county orphan asylum and made her a companion—almost adopted her. One day, a very poor theatrical company had been stabled in the town, and while Mariage Bayton, the leading man—a handsome fellow he was, too—was waiting for some money from friends in the North, Sallie Hollis had fallen quickly and desperately in love with him and he with her. The money came and Sallie eloped. She had written later a protest but joyous letter to Aunt Laura, enclosing her marriage certificate, and that was the last heard of pretty Sallie. That was eight years ago, and the sweet old lady heartily cherished an inveterate prejudice against all things theatrical (including the circus) because of the loss of the young girl she had grown to love.

But all that is neither here nor there.

"I'm very sorry for that, Auntie; but that doesn't alter the fact that the circus is a jolly thing to see. I'm going to see it if father—"

"Oh, of course! you'll go to see it, like all the children, and probably get torn to pieces by the wild animals. What's that you have in your hand?"

Bobby passed the handbill to her; she adjusted her spectacles and, holding it at arm's length, began to read it. She

THE DOCTOR'S STORY.

BY JOHN A. COVINGTON.

"BELIEVE me, no! I'm not a physician," said the doctor, when I paid him my first visit a week after I was introduced to him. He appeared to be very wealthy—at least his bachelor apartments were literally filled with minor works of art, rich upholsteries, curios and trophies from every part of the world, it seemed.

It was a novel experience for a young man to feel himself received so cordially and on such apparent equality by one fully twenty-five years his senior and in a place of such luxury.

It was winter and the heavy plush curtains were let down to completely cover the windows and doors, but not quite shut out the moon of the more freighted gale. Then the doctor brought me out from his bedroom a loose blouse and a pair of Turkish slippers, turned the light half down, wheeled me in my chair up to the big fire where I had a superb skin of some wild animal under my feet and—what more could a fellow want!

"No, I'm something of a chemist, something of a naturalist and some other things besides; by virtue of which I've traveled over nearly every part of the globe, Australia and otherwise."

"That slide under your foot is a relic of my expedition into the wilds of South America for an American rubber house. They wanted some experiments made with the many kinds of trees known to produce rubber or caoutchouc, but not then used for commercial purposes."

"Then you know all about the process of making rubber?" said I. "It was only the other day that I saw down town in a shop window a huge lump of it—those feet across. I guess it was, and nearly two feet thick—and in wondering where it came from and how it was made, it occurred to me how curious it was that we should have so many million things of common use about us everywhere, yet hardly ever give a thought to the way they were made, the hands and machinery they passed through."

"Yes for you, my boy! And for me give you an idea, right here, as you're in the writing den. You wouldn't write a more interesting book for the young fellows than one on 'How Things Are Made.' I mean just such things as you speak of—things of common use. Your lead pencil, the glass you drink from and the like. What do you think of that?"

"I think so well of it that I'll look the glass over," said I, and I made a note in my memorandum book. "And, as might begin with a little information about rubber?" I added interrogatively.

"Well, that'll lead right up to the story I had in mind to tell you about that colossal skin under your feet. You've seen those enormous rubber plants with the smooth leaves that people use for decorative purposes. Well, that is a small species of the rubber tree that grows to almost sixty feet in height. The rubber workers make a deep horizontal slit in the bark of this tree, with another vertical one running from it up the trunk, and others branching off from the vertical slit on either side. They do this in the evening. Under the horizontal cut they fasten a little clay cup to the tree by means of some soft clay and in the morning this cup is pretty nearly filled with the milky juice that comes out of all those incisions—about two ounces a day from each tree.

"When the contents of these cups is emptied in to one large receptacle they begin the really curious part of the processing, but no one is just quite clear why only certain things give certain results. First, they heat certain soft palm, make it a jar with a narrow neck, out of which comes a little amount of white vapor from the sap. They have a stick about three feet long with a clay paddle on the end and this they dip into the milky juice before it has cooled very long or has its color of ammonia. The paddle, all coated with juice, they slowly turn in that white vapor from the jar and as they do that the moisture from the juice evaporates and a thin coat of rubber is left on the paddle.

"Only the vapor of these trees does it properly and a man's sap can't be used. No one can. Well then? There's the rubber coated paddle; they dip it again so that the rubber is covered with more juice and the same turning over the sap vapor goes on until the second coat also has become rubber. And so it goes, until a pretty big lump is on the end of the stick—two's what you see down town, a 'house' as they call it, though that one must have been a monster."

"All they've got to do now is to cut the block apart to the size and it comes off the paddle easily enough. The lump is transported to any part of the world and, as rubber softens under heat, it is easily worked and manipulated. Think you know it now?"

"It couldn't be chosen," I replied, "and I am glad you didn't use any Latin terms or foreign words. People usually think they're bound to do that when they're explaining something."

"Those should be left alone for scientific fellows, the sn. What you want is general information, I think."

"Exactly!" I answered heartily. "But haven't we just DIRKMAN'S LUCK.

CHAPTER I.

A CHANCE MEETING.

"GODDNESS me! What's that?"

With a startled gesture the young girl stepped quickly back from the moss-covered spring, over which she was bending to fill her pail, and gazed in open-eyed surprise at a scrawny-looking hump-buddled-up in the deep grass a few paces away. She was a sweet-faced girl of about fourteen, plainly but neatly dressed, and she presented a remarkably attractive picture as she stood there, tightly clasping the handle of the pail with her small hands.

As the object of her doubtful attention gave no symptoms of life, she timidly approached a step or two nearer.

"Why, it's a man—a tramp—nothing!" she exclaimed beneath her breath, and her first impulse was to turn and hurry away. But a second glance convinced her that the figure was too small for a man. With growing confidence she stepped still closer until she was almost above the still form.

It was a boy, scarcely more than fifteen, comfortably stretched upon the ground, and sleeping soundly though the glaring sun now poured its full rays directly on his upturned face.

"A nice, honest-looking boy in spite of his clothes," was the girl's first thought as she gazed curiously at him. "Who can he be I wonder, and what is he doing out here at this hour of the morning?"

That he was no common tramp or vagabond she had determined at first glance. That he was a foot-traveler of some kind was quite plain, however, from the heavy walking stick by his side, and the small, neatly tied bundle beneath his head.

"Probably some farm hand out of work and tramping about in search of a new place," said the young girl. "There are plenty of them this time of the year."

Satisfied with this conclusion, and fearing to wake him, she stepped noiselessly away. She had filled her pail and was about to go when she suddenly found herself, in turn, the object of scrutiny.

The young stranger was sitting bolt upright, gazing about him with the half-dazed manner of one who has just been roused from a sound sleep. A moment more and this gave way to an expression of surprise and interest as he saw the young girl standing before him.

She turned hastily away, when his voice arrested

An expression of surprise crossed the girl's face.

"New York is a long distance away," she said.

"Yes, and I've been a long time on the tramp—over a week. I'm glad it's over."

"Are you looking for friends here?"

"No, I have no friends. I've come out into the country to try to make a living. My first week has been a pretty hard one, and if the next week isn't better I'm afraid I'll be turning back to the city again in spite of my promise."

"Your promise!"

"Yes, miss, but you don't understand all that, and it wouldn't interest you much either I take it. Could you please tell me, do you know a man here by the name of Meek?"

"Meek? Oh, yes. He's one of the grocers in town."

"Yes, that's the man."

"Do you know him?" she asked.

"No, I can't say I do—though I hope so. I've been referred to him, that's all."

"It will be easy to find him. Any one in town can show you where his store is."

"I'm in a hurry—later will do—in fact, miss, if— if you'll understand me, I don't exactly like to go there right away. You see I want to ask him for a place in his store—or a chance to make a living somehow, and I'm afraid I'd stand on shore just now. You see, my clothes aren't worth to look at. I'm tired and dirty from my long tramp; and then, miss, I'm—well, I'm hungry—very hungry—"

"If you'll come up to the house," interrupted the girl, quickly detecting his embarrassment and seeking to relieve it, "we'll give you something to eat."

"No, miss, don't misunderstand me," said the boy's face flushed. "I don't beg. I only want a chance to earn a meal, and brush up a bit. If necessary I can pay for it. I have a little money—but it's very little and I'd rather work than spend any of it."

The girl's sympathy was now thoroughly aroused.

"Come to the house," she said. "I think Aunt Betty or Duncan can do something for you. I am her—a pleasant voice it was, with a frank, honest ring to it.

"Excuse me, miss, but where am I?"

She could hardly help smiling at the question.

"Are you lost?" she asked.

"That's what I'd like to find out. I've been tramping all night, and don't know where I've brought up. Am I anywhere near Medford?"

"This is Medford—at least the town is only a short walk up the road."

The boy's face brightened.

"Then I'm all right. I've come some distance to find this town—clear from New York."

BATTLING WITH FORTUNE.

By Matthew White, Jr.

Author of "A Woman's Boy," "The Duke of York," etc.

CHAPTER I.

1892. 1891. 1890.

IT was New Year's Eve, and the young people at the Stoddins mansion had the dining room to themselves. It was not only the thirty-first of December, but Jack Stoddins's nineteenth birthday as well. No it had been agreed to hold a grand social celebration.

"Let's make it a triple allusion, and have some Hallow-Eve tricks," proposed Phil Bailey, during a lull in the festivities while everybody was cooling off after a game of Reversi. "The last night of the year always seems sort of spooky to me, so I mean we have Mollie get on a plate of foam, a table, and a gold ring, and we'll see who's to have the best luck."

This suggestion was received with favor, and Mollie Stoddins soon produced from the kitchen a plate of the poultry compound, into which Margaret Gray dropped her ring, whereupon Phil stirred the mass friskily around with the knife, and then proceeded to put it on Mollie.

"Now, Percy," he said, turning to his neighbor on the left, "you begin. Take this knife and cut two strokes just as if you were dividing up a pie. No, no fair taking such a big slice. There, now poke your knife around in the center of your triangle and see if you feel the ring. No, you've missed out. Now, Bernice, you're next."

Bernice Gray was equally unsuccessful, and the plate was passed to Churchill Wells.

Churchill was the same age as Jack Stoddins, but by reason of being a pronounced dandy, seemed much older. As he wore obscenely high collars and was continually adjusting his cuffs, Phil had dubbed him "Collars and Cuffs," the nickname applied to the eldest son of the Prince of Wales. And Churchill, who was a great deal of an Anglo-American, seemed actually to be proud of the sobriquet.

He smiled when Phil called out: "Now, Collars and Cuffs, put your luck to the test, and remember if you strike the ring you must put your face in the plate and poke it out with your teeth, or the charm is broken."

Churchill gingerly took the knife, but he had not got half through his first cut, when there was a clink, and a great shout went up from the deeply interested onlookers. Young Wells thrust at his success, and then, pushing back his chair, stood up and prepared to carry out with great dignity and grace the second part of the programme.

"Remember to keep your hands behind your back," Phil admonished him, and all bowed eagerly forward to watch proceedings.

Slowly Churchill lowered his head to the plate till at last his nose was buried in the foam. And just at this instant Jack Stoddins wickedly shouted:

"Don't forget to master your charm," observed Phil, as all watched her in eager expectancy.

"Call upon your fairy godmother to guide your finger right," added Jack.

"Remember now," explained Russell, "that water means no husband at all, with a happy marriage, and vinegar a tyrant of a man."

Mollie wiped her finger in the air three times over the three "goblets of destiny," as Percy called them, and then plunged it down into the foam. She was about to test the handkerchief from her eyes when Russell observed the exclamations of the others and said: "You must tell us now by the team which it is."

Mollie slipped her finger into her mouth and then exclaimed in a disgusted tone: "Water."

A shout went up at this and Phil wanted to know if the Stoddins' debutantes had money pumps on their farms. But the laugh was turned against him, when his own finger went into the water.

"I don't care," he cried, "I never did intend to marry." But he looked disappointed, nevertheless.

Bernice and Percy both struck the water, and Margaret had the "lucky" look of getting into the mill. Then it was Russell's turn. Nobody but touched the vinegar yet, and all held their breath as Russ's finger hesitated for an instant over the fatal glass. Then he moved it with a sudden change of purpose till it was just ready to descend into the mill, then changed his mind again and plunged it into the vinegar with a splash.

"Taste it! taste it!" cried several voices at once, and he did so with a very face.

"Well, it seems a little rough, old man," remarked Jack as he removed the handkerchief, "that the fellow who proposed the test should be the one to suffer the most by it."

"Oh, I don't mind," rejoined Russell. "I don't believe in good and bad luck, except to have fun with, as we've been doing tonight."

"Why, Russ, how can you say such a thing?" exclaimed Phil. "You who just won the prize for speaking at the Glee Club."

"I hope you don't think that was pure luck, Phil?" returned Russell, while Percy gave the luckless Harvey a pinch in the side to remind him that he had put his foot into it.

"Oh, of course I didn't mean that you didn't deserve it," answered Phil, getting out over the wrong impression he had managed to convey.

ALL HOLD THEIR BREATH AS RUSS'S FINGER HESITATES FOR AN INSTANT OVER THE FATAL GLASS.

"Rats," which caused each girl in the circle to spring back in alarm, and set Churchill to sporting in the floor with a vigor that sent the poultry stuff in clouds all over him.

When he lifted his head he was a sight to see, with foam in patches all over his face, streaked through his hanging hair and stuck in whiskers on his coat. But he had the ring gripped in his teeth, and seemed to consider that his success in securing it was a compensation for all his pains in arriving at that end.

"I guess we've had enough of that," said Russell Gray, when the laugh at Churchill's appearance had subsided and he had been made presentable again with the aid of a finger bowl and a white towel. "Suppose we try the milk, vinegar and water test now?"

All were ready for a diversion, so three glasses were produced, each filled with the above named liquids. Mollie volunteered to be the "first victim," as she expressed it, and having submitted to being thickened, stood by the edge of the table with her finger poised over the glasses.

The Mystery of the Seven Gars.

BY T. A. HARRIS.

I STILL vividly recall sitting next the driver of the leading wagon of the train that took our family out to Utah thirty-four years ago. Fortunately, the remembrance of the hardships and suffering of that tedious journey of many weeks is spared to me; but my mother, time and time again, used to recount the incidents of that memorable pilgrimage, and never fail to express her wonderment—to say nothing of her gratitude—that such a little chap as I should have ever survived that experience.

It took some months, I believe, to make the journey from Ohio to Salt Lake City. The transportation was done by a long train of Conestoga wagons that Eastern folks only see in old pictures nowadays—those long, deep bodied wagons with canvas hoods their whole length, supported on belying hoops that swung like a balloon in a gale of wind at every jolt.

It was hard enough on the prairie sections with the beating sun, the lack of water, and the fine, sharp dust that rose in clouds from the parched ground; but it was worse, far worse, when we approached the rugged ways in the Black Hills or had to traverse the sterile deserts of the far West.

Not until thirty years after did I have occasion to come East again, and then, what a difference! Instead of taking a northern route, by which we made our pilgrimage, I came straight across Colorado by the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad. The way was even more formidable than the first one; it traversed ever wilder and grander and more desolate country—but one had but to sit patiently, almost, in his railway coach while modern mechanics drew him at lightning speed over and out of the stifling deserts or dragged him up and over the most stupendous mountains and through the grandest scenery of the world, as I am ready to believe.

It is of the first stage of that journey, on the line of railway that I have mentioned, that I wish to speak. Through one stage of it I rode in the cab of the locomotive, the better to see and appreciate the thrilling features of that Colorado country, and I heard a yarn from the engineer that illustrates some of the dangers and possible horrors of that trail, which is worth repeating.

The Rocky Mountains run north and south through Colorado in the middle of the State, and the railroad plunges into them and over them along one of the most marvelous canyons in the world.

mountain sides, and seven times in all does it pass over itself in the effort to reach the giddy heights above at easy grades. I say "easy grades;" I mean, comparatively easy, for the usual grade there, four feet in every hundred, is itself remarkable, while on some branches of this many armed road, which tags innumerable and scattered mines, the grade is all the way from four to seven feet in one hundred.

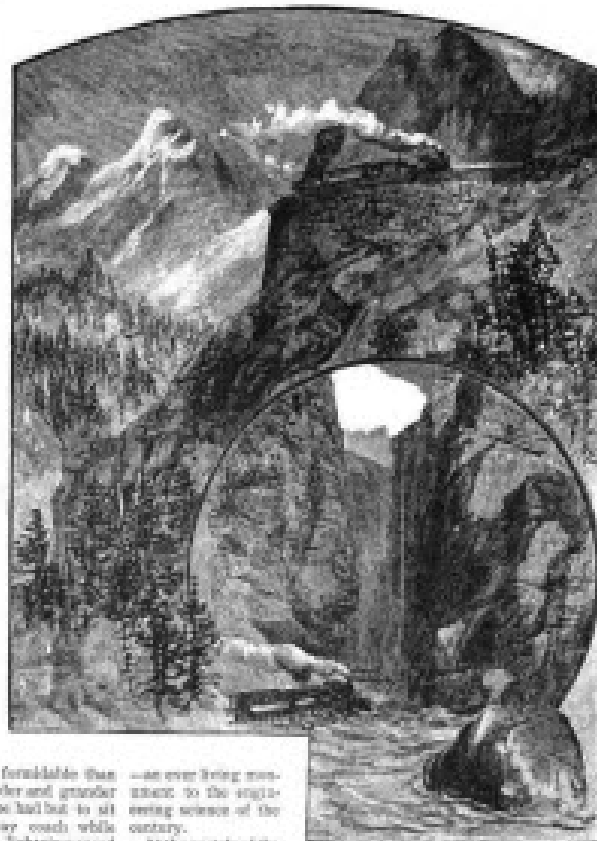

To make a bed for the railway through this canyon the solid rock along the little torrent had to be blasted out, foot by foot, and, at one point, the danger and difficulty of this was so great that the tracks were run over a short bridge that was suspended by chains from the apex of two iron rafters joined like an inverted A, the two ends of which were planted in the solid granite walls of the opposing sides of the gorge.

All this had to be surveyed as a first step, and that was a terrible undertaking for the engineers, railroad men and laborers. At some points, my friend of the locomotive told me, the surveyors found the gorge so impassable that they had to do their instrument work swinging in mid air, lowered from the top of the canyon a thousand feet or more.

This information I gathered while riding on the engine, and I have since seen it corroborated in a remarkable book recently published, an "American Railways." But here is a true story which I have never seen in print, though it cannot have failed to get into the newspapers at the time the tragedy occurred.

Our train had scaled the loftiest heights of the mountain pass and we were at that point where the passenger, traveling on the highest brink of the canyon, can look down the vertical line of the facing wall, down, down over half a mile! The rails lie within a few feet of the edge of the chasm, and the realization of one's nearness to death and eternity is thrilling.

At the point I speak of, we met a straight line grade of seven miles in length. Here the road descends, the walls of the canyon, decreasing in height west, at the end of the seven mile straight, a curve is met where the sheer fall is only about a thousand feet—just think, only three times as high as Trinity church.

THE GARS HAD DROPT LIKE A GIGANTIC BALL FAR

—an ever living monument to the engineering science of the century.

All the portals of the Royal Gorge begin the walls of a fearful chasm—a canyon whose walls run straight up, at some points over five thousand feet high. The road runs into the canyon, whose bottom is the bed of a brown roaring mountain stream. The railway constantly ascends and, leaving the cañon, it turns and twists in an open valley, crossing it and recrossing it, winding gradually up the

CHAPTER I.

HIMSELF AND MY UNCLE.

"LUKE!"
"Yes, Mr. Stillwell."
"Why didn't you sweep and dust the office this morning?"

"I did, sir."

"You did!" exclaimed the gentleman, who, I may as well state, was my esteemed uncle. "I must say, young man, lately you have proved yourself to be an astonishing doer. Look here, and then dare to tell me that this office has seen the back of a broom or duster this day!"

And my Uncle Felix motioned me majestically into his office with one hand, while with the other he pointed in bitter scorn at the door.

Mr. Felix Stillwell was in a bad humor. His sarcastic tones told this quite as well as the sour look upon his face. Evidently some business matters had gone wrong, and he intended to vent the spleen raised thereby upon me. He was a high strong man at the best, and when anything went wrong the first person in his way was sure to catch the full benefit of his ire.

I was an orphan, and had lived with my Uncle Felix three years. Previous to that time I was a scholar at the Hargrave Military and Commercial Academy, a first class training school for boys, situated upon the Palisades, overlooking the Hudson River.

My father was a retired lawyer, who, being in ill health, went with my mother on a two years' trip to Europe. They journeyed from place to place for sixteen months, and then lost their lives in a terrible railway accident in England. The death of both my parents at once was a fearful blow to me, and for a long while I could not think, and was utterly unable to judge what was taking place around me. At the end of three months I was informed that Mr. Stillwell had been appointed my guardian, and then I was taken from school and placed in his office in New York City.

My duties at the office of Stillwell, Grindler & Co. were varied. In the morning I was expected to clean everything as bright as a gin. Then I went to the post office, and on a dozen other errands; after which I did such writing as was placed in my hands.

For this work I was allowed my board, clothing and fifty cents a week spending money—not a large sum, but one with which I could have been content had other things been equal.

But they were far from being so. I lived with my uncle, but I was not treated as one of the family. His wife—I do not care to call her my aunt—

Looking back at those times I often wonder how it was I stood the treatment as long as I did. During my parents' lives I had had nearly everything that my heart wished, and to be thus cut short, not only in my health-wants, but also in consideration and affection, was hard indeed.

To my mind there was no reason why I should be treated as one so far beneath the family. My mother had been a gentleman's and my father a gentleman, and I was conceited enough to think that by both breeding and education I was fully the equal of my cousins. Besides, my father had been well to do, and had, no doubt, left me a fair inheritance.

Had I had less to do I would have been lonely in a city where I hardly knew a soul. But my work kept me so busy I had no time to think of myself and perhaps this is one reason why I did not rebel before I did.

In the whole of the metropolis there was but one person whom I considered a friend. That was Mr. Joe Mason, who had his law office in the same building with Stillwell, Grindler & Co. I had done a number of errands for this gentleman, and in return he had become interested in me.

To Mr. Mason I confided my story in all its details, and when I had finished he told me that if matters did not mend, or got worse, to let him know, and he would see what could be done for me.

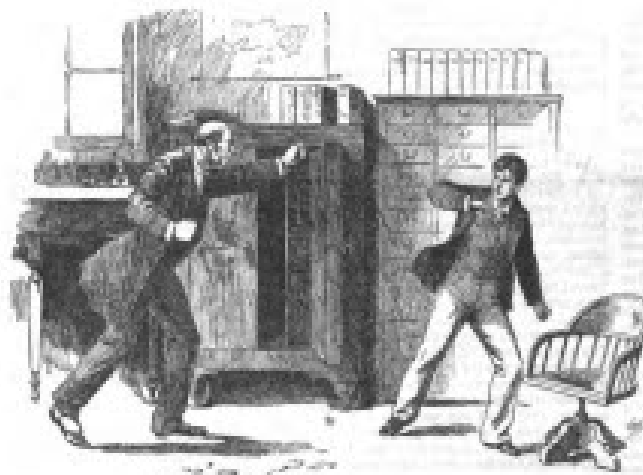

My uncle did not like Mr. Mason, who, on several occasions had had clients who wished to obtain patents, and whom he had taken elsewhere. The reason given being that Stillwell, Grindler & Co.'s rates were too high, though their peculiar methods of getting patents had much to do with it.

It was the morning of my seventeenth birthday. I had requested my uncle, several days previous, to give me a holiday, which I intended to spend with an old school chum of mine, Harry Barker, at his home in Locustville, a pretty village, fifty miles northwest of the city.

The Barker family and mine had been well acquainted, and I had received numerous invitations from them to spend some time at their home, a large farm; but was each time forced to decline.

When I had requested my uncle to let me go for just one day, I had thought it would be impossible for him to refuse, as it was the middle of July, and business was dull. I had saved my money for ever was a very proud woman who had come from a blue blooded Boston family, and she hardly deigned to notice me. When she did it was in a patronizing manner, as if I was a manual laborer beneath her.

My two cousins, Lillian and Augustus, were even less civil. Lillian, who was a fashionable mis of seventeen, never spoke to me excepting when she wanted something done, and Gus, as everyone called him, thought it his right to order me around as if I was his valet.

In the matter of food and clothing I was scarcely considered. Any of Gus's cast off suits were thought good enough for the office, and my Sunday suit was two years old. I had my breakfast with the servants before the others were up, took my room bath with me, and dined when I returned from the office, which was generally two hours after Mr. Stillwell, when everything was cold.

THE FATE OF THE TIGER CAT.

BY HUGH PENNOCK.

IT would be hard to find a prettier sight than was the beautiful full rigged clipper Alice as she glided gently up toward Calcutta one soft, languid afternoon at the beginning of the century.

With all sails set and but just heaving in the light Indian airs she passed majestically to windward of the great British seventy four that lay at anchor and, coming about, down went her own anchor with a loud splash and up went her private signal to the fore peak. It was that of Frost & Company of Salem, Massachusetts whose China traders were unladen on the coast.

Eight and early next morning the Alice was towed in and tied up to the wharf while her Indian consignments were unloaded and her exchange merchandise was taken aboard, before proceeding on her further way clear around to the China coast.

This being completed, shore leave was granted to the men, a fire at a time and for a short while.

It was on the afternoon of her departure when it was found that two of the crew of the Alice were missing—Dan Carson and Chris Matheson.

Captain Plunkett sent his second mate ashore with a company of hands, who beat up the town thoroughly; they had no difficulty in locating the two delinquents up to a certain point; at that point, both being remembered to have been in a painfully isolated condition, they disappeared completely. The mate as reported and the Alice, whose voyages were always made on time against accompanying losses, sailed that evening short-handed.

The following morning two beggarly and bleary-eyed men came out from under a wretched bush and asked each other where they were. The glittering domes and minarets in the distance told them they were a mile out of Calcutta and, stupidly wondering how they had ever got so far away from their liquor, they bent their uncertain steps back toward town.

They had no sooner reached the city than they ran up against a gallant company of men from

H. M. S. Tiger Cat who laid violent hands on our two worthies. These, you may be sure, did not hesitate to let out right and left against the whole twenty or so of the Brisker's crew but it needed only a couple of clips from a bludgeon to silence both the Yankons. Again, on that same day, they awoke to wonder where they were; they soon found out; they were between the decks of H. M. S. Tiger Cat, making across the Bay of Bengal toward the Burmese coast, for the purpose of picking up the pirates that infested those waters (that is, if they allowed themselves to be caught) and wiping them off the face of the earth.

Chris and Dan knew their business. They had been impressed and there was nothing to do but make the best of it and trust to luck. When Chris learned that the Alice had sailed the day before he confided to Dan that they were just as well off as they were; they were lured upon by Captain Plunkett as deserters and were liable to prosecution and punishment in their own country; but it needed only a slight shrug of the shoulders to prove, against such a charge, that they were victims of British lawlessness and thus much cleared against and guiltless.

So, they accepted the situation, took their assigned places in the main watch and, when the helms piped them on deck, Chris as usual was the first man in the ship. First of the whole watch he scrambled up the companion ladder and sprang out upon the deck.

IT all happened as a result of the common boarder custom, which Mrs. Shore was so set against.

"You don't seem to realize, mother," said Leslie, "the material advantage that this common boarder movement is bringing with it. I confess, I don't know what I should do if my two lodgers ranaway; but for every new boarder in the neighborhood, this bit of land is worth just as much more money, and every day—yes, I really am hardly back too far ahead, I suppose!"

"For a boy, who has never been to Boston, you do talk in the greatest way," laughed Mrs. Shore, good naturedly, and she was acknowledging that, indeed, for the sake of the lovely head of her son a few little tags that were certainly not in request. "I, for my part, do not like to see this quiet and beautiful spot overrun with strangers; it seems like profaning some sacred place to allow its beauty to be marred by hundreds of white-striped flannels and outrageous staring artificial flowers from the great hot city."

Mrs. Shore was quite right, too, as to the merit of it all. Captain's Head was certainly a beautiful spot. The low lying sandy coast to the seaward here took its first rise and in the Head showed the first indication of what was to become the granite cliffs of Maine.

From the beach rose a succession of rocky eminences, the furthest back from the shore was the Head, and this was the highest point of the coast, from the top of which one could look straight out to the eastern ocean where there was nothing but that still, solemn world of sky and sea that was so beautiful and so dreary on fair days; on stormy and tempestuous days there came dull gray days of rain and swirling, wind-charged waves. On the north the every prospectively fell down to a placid bay, magnificently calm, excepting when the gale whirled down from the north. On the other side of this bay was Cliff Harbor, a shall bay, de-saying aspect. In a year the railway might be there bringing with it the capitalist and "improver" to build hotels and casinos and merry-go-rounds on the lovely bay close to the Head.

Mrs. Shore was left by will and testament of her husband, Captain Zachariah Shore, all of that highest promontory known as Captain's Head, the long and lonely (but so picturesque) hamlet nestled behind the shelter of its highest point, and the grassy westward slope down to the sandy beach of the bay, with quite a piece of that shore that is now a water front valued at a million.

Visitors to the neighboring towns all strolled their way to the Head, for there was the show view of the district. Intruders were not always kept away from the homestead by the steel fence and heavy swinging gate. One in particular was forced one day from burning thirst, after a romp on the heated seashore and the climb back up the rocks to push back the gate and beg a dipper of water from the old-fashioned well.

The old well was in vain; she asked for water and got, instead, a cup of scalding seawater, fresh, most, creamy with oysters without the slightest show of impurities, though the head that gave it was all covered with the foam in which it had been plunged when the intruder appeared at the lagoon window.

The flushed face there was that of a girl of fifteen—beautiful then, I am told, and, indeed, I know she was, by a picture of her taken about that time.

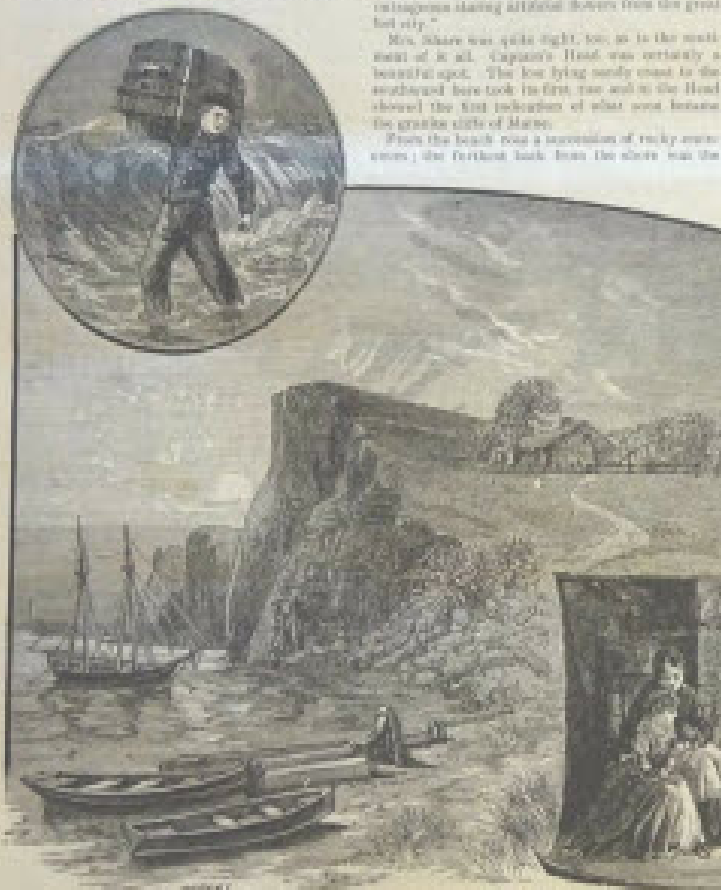

She drank her cup of milk with a grateful little sigh of relief and enjoyment and then said:

"Oh! if you only knew how good that is, you wouldn't mind being bothered," glancing around at rolling pine, and dough and no milk and floury arms; "and I am so sure to have troubled you."

"No bother at all, my dear," answered Mrs. Shore, who seemed to be gathering equal enjoyment from the sight of such a fresh and pretty young face. "but I hope you won't mind taking a chair and resting yourself a bit; you look so tired and flushed."

"Can I?" cried the visitor.

"Oh like to, and I won't

SENTENCED TO FREEDOM.

BY RUSSELL STODOLSON.

DURING the first few months of a boy's connection with the Penskill Military Academy, he was apt to form several distinct and, sometimes, impressions of the character of Brigadier General Putnam, the principal.

At first sight, if in repose, he appeared to be fat and good natured—a combination by no means impressive or awe-compelling. When he began to move, however, a merry twinkle would flash from his eyes and perhaps he would choose to exert the playful humor which he had within easy call; then he impressed one as being a right good old fellow and a bright one—far from the stiff and severe personage one would picture as the task master of a lot of untamed boys. When he rose to his feet and moved about, it was as once apparent that his carriage was grandly dignified and his action precisely military. If he gave a command, it was in no wise harshly, but in a tone of quiet decision that there was no quibbling or with a certain snap that made the hearer spring to obey. It was found that his enforcement of discipline was strict to a degree; infractions of it were investigated with the fulness and fairness of a court of justice and punishments were inflicted by him, sometimes uniquely, but always in the most telling manner; that is to say, a culprit was always made to understand wherein he had sinned, to feel how unworthy was his act and to comprehend fully the logic of his punishment through the medium of his own reasoning powers.

Perhaps a lad never liked the general more than when he left that august presence after being taken to task, because he never failed, if he had any intelligence at all, to appreciate that he had been treated in a straightforward, manly and even fatherly manner, as if he were a consenting being, a man of honor and not a refractory infant.

There were regular scheduled punishments for ordinary offenses—extra guard duty, arrest, confinement in the guard house, lesser restriction of liberty, the committing to memory of verses and so on. But the general seemed to revel in the invention of peculiar and telling expiations for offenses out of the ordinary. One of these is the motive of this narrative.

I ought to add that everything was strictly above-board at the P. M. A. Some one once went to the general and proceeded to inform one of the boys who had played some yet undiscovered prank—I understand manner in which the knowledge had come to him, an investigation would be made; he hoped the perpetrator would be manly enough to come forward and take his punishment; if he persisted, he could go out free. Boys are touched by a reliance on their honor; the guilty one did come forward promptly and he found he faced not so very badly.

The year I graduated I was senior officer and on intimate terms with the general, so that I had an opportunity to know all the facts about the following incident, which is unique to a degree, especially for a strictly organized institution like a military school, and perhaps it may carry a moral to those in authority who comprehend no other way of ruling subordinates than by what I am pleased to call "primary school methods."

In the winter of '86—just after the holidays, the boys in the fourth dormitory were a little lanky after their fat at home and somebody there organized a scheme to break out at night after taps and go down to the Penskill Hotel for a late supper.

It is unnecessary to go into all the details of the plan; it was a deep laid plot and well organized by Billy Schenck, the leader; hats were to be noiselessly removed, a window silently opened, the sentry "put to sleep" and all that.

Then Billy went down on the sly with a small delegation to "old man Jax," the proprietor of the hotel and ordered the supper.

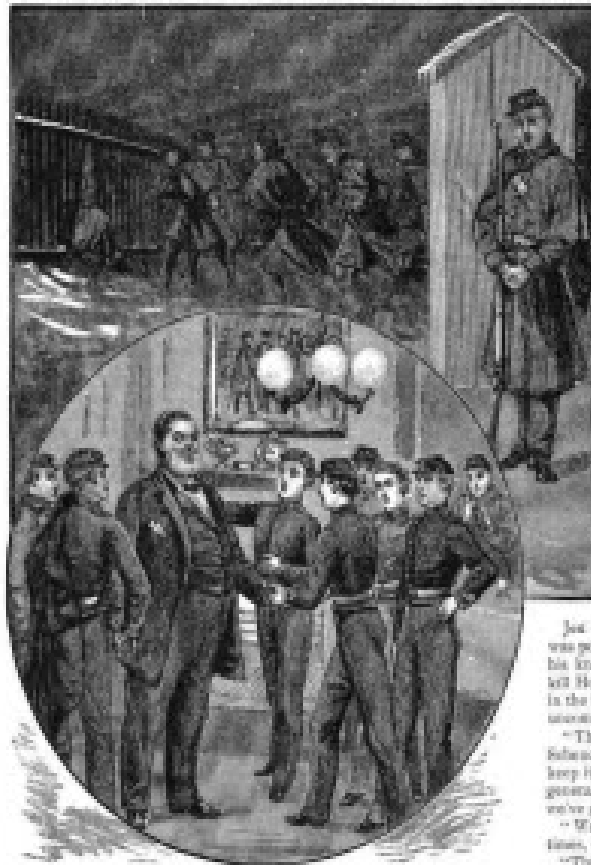

Just happened somewhat, as the general was powerful in the town and, if it came to his knowledge that the owner of the Penskill Hotel was aiding and abetting his boys in the infraction of rules, he might make it uncomfortable for the said Jax.

"That's all right, old man!" replied Billy Schenck to this. "It's to our interest to keep it from coming to the knowledge of the general, isn't it? Well then, you can bet we've got things down to a fine point."

"Well, I suppose. Plans does slip up sometimes, I've heard."

"That's all right—Billy Schenck didn't lay down plans. Now see here, old man. This supper is a go—you understand? It is in such a corner, you know, to have our little blue eyes here at the Central, now isn't it? Never for both sides, you know."

Billy was certainly shrewd (he's a prominent politician now); his last remark was an audacious hint that a part at least of the school trade might be transferred to the railway hotel, Jax's compeforget what. Before he could get the guilty one's name out of his mouth, the general shot him up, gave him a lecture on spying and informing, and announced to the school that he had heard that such and such an act had been committed; owing to the Trapping with the Tobiques.

BY MAEL CHRISTIE STEPHENS.

"THIS time it shall be an Indian story," said Uncle William Nibby, tipping forward in his chair, and laying his pipe upon the fire frame.

"That's good! I like that!" cried Arthur and Owen (his nephews) together.

"It happened a long while ago, when this region about the Assiniboine River was all a wilderness. A few rude settlements had been made, where loggers could get supplies for the camp, and trappers exchanged their furs for provisions and traps. Then Indians were more plenty than they now are. Civilization doesn't agree with them, and the tribe is fast dying out. They hunted, and trapped, and fished in the same waters with the white men, but the same spirit of treachery was still in their red skins that was there in the old French war, as you will see by the story.

"One fall three Indians of the Tobique tribe, for that is what we call them about these parts, who had been living round one of the settlements for a year or two, started to go up towards Menomonge Lake, the head waters of the Assiniboine River, to trap, as that was a famous region for game of all sorts, and is to this day. Their Indian names were awful jargonisms, so I will give them in square English. Hook Nose, Big Ear, and Long Tongue—names given them by their tribe to indicate, doubtless, their physical peculiarities.

"They had not many traps of their own, and no gun, so they persuaded a young man by the name of Lovejoy, who was well provided with traps, and had a gun, to go with them. He was a skillful trapper, and the Indians promised him one third of the proceeds of the winter's work. Lovejoy had a big, savage dog, too, famous for hunting large game, which was taken along.

"At first the Indians did not much relish Caesar's company. They stood in fear of the savage brute, who seemed to take a great dislike to them, but, after seeing his worth in hunting, they became friendly toward the dog. Not so, Caesar, however. He still looked upon his dark companions with distrust, and would never allow any familiarity from one of them. The Indians were always smoking about the camp, a proceeding which seemed to fill Caesar with rage, for he could never be coaxed inside the camp, even with fresh deer stank; and once, when Long Tongue stooped near him to get fresh fuel for the fire, his black, stumpy pipe smelling as strong as a skunk, I dare say, and puffing clouds too, for his master strapped forty pounds of snuff things on would not easily damage, on to his back, which he carried with ease. But the trappers endured on getting much of their living in the woods. Most trappers do.

"They were some days getting to Menomonge and building a little log shanty, just big enough to sleep in comfortably. The cooking was done outside. The cooking was done outside. Then they began setting their traps—all the steel ones they brought, and the rest wooden, made mostly after the dead-fall fashion. Two lines were set in a half circle, one standing north from the camp and the other south, and both running away off and around, and meeting in the center. Two of the Indians flanked the north line, and Lovejoy and the other Indian the south line. They would all start at the same time on their route, and meet and go into camp together.

"Game was plenty, and the trappers gathered in a large pile of valuable fur—mink, sable, desp-errier, and, occasionally, a bear skin.

"After they had been in camp about three months, the snow got terribly deep. On this account they got but few skins, and there was some talk among the trappers of taking up the traps and going out.

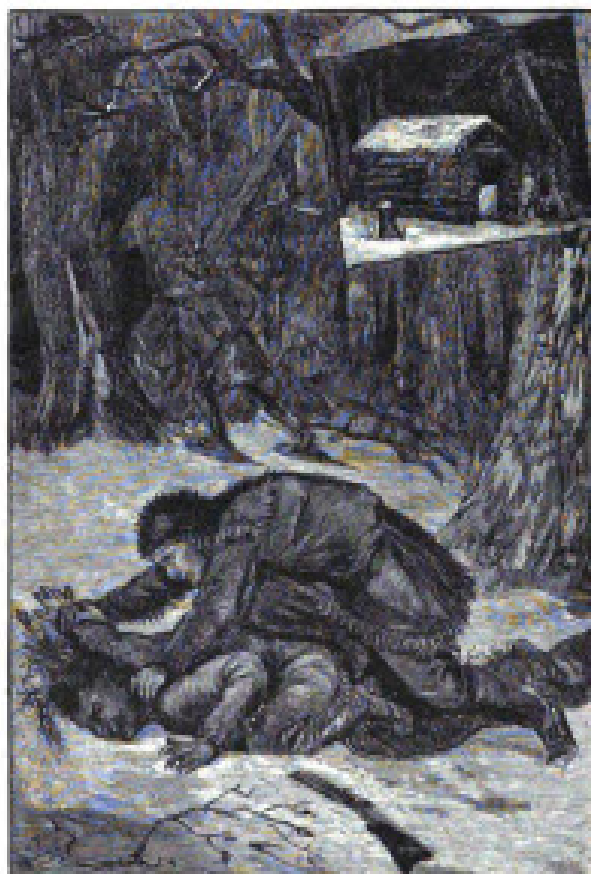

"About this time Lovejoy began to notice a change towards him on the part of his brother trappers. They became angry, and once or twice he caught them in close jabber together, but when discovered, they walked off with an air that meant mischief.

"At first he could scarcely make out what they were up to. But one morning after this sly talk and Indian tales had been going on for about a week, old Long Tongue he up and says he couldn't go on the line that day, for he had a lame foot; and he limped about the shanty in a dreadful way.

"See! see no hobble today. Tomorrow better—good deal better! Hobble then plenty just right!"

"Big Ear couldn't go either, for he had got to mend his moccasins. 'Him got plenty wat, rip. Him-by heel go, too go. Noting left.'

"Hook Nose had found out all of a sudden, that the provisions were about gone, and remembered that it was his turn to go hunting. So Big Ear asked Lovejoy to go over the trail, this time alone.

LOVEJOY MADE A SUDDEN PLUNGE DOWN UPON THE BEAR OF THE INDIAN, CRUSHING HIM NEARLY OUT OF SIGHT IN THE DEEP SNOW.

of smoke into his face, the angry dog seized it savagely, crunching it in his great jaws, and nearly taking the Indian's nose along with it.

"It was a hundred miles to the chosen hunting ground, and all their stores and traps had to be packed in on their shoulders over the rough trail through the woods. Caesar was found useful here,

BACK TO FONDLE HALL.

THE great board train arrived at Northwood Junction just a minute after the week board, and found the latter waiting for it, the engine sending up little puffs of steam at irregular, jerky effect upon a hill of some eighteen years who was just stepping from the rear platform of the other train, valise in hand, and a good saturated look on his weathered face. He had evidently expected the salute, for his feet had not touched the boards before he waved his free hand to the row of bobbing heads and uttered an acknowledgment.

"One—two—three! Bridge Hakester!"

The occupant of the cheering made no other response than to flourish his arm again, and then went forward to the baggage car, in order to see if and then settled himself in a seat beside a boy with a long body and a thin neck.

"Hardly seems as if we'd been away from the Hall for over two months, does it, Tom?" he began affably.

intervals, as if impatient of the delay. As the late train drew in with a whistle and a clatter, the heads of fourteen boys—two at a window—ornamented the side of a front car of the waiting train, and each one at a certain signal shouted loudly:

"Hello, Hakester! This way!"

This volley, which was sent forth with a vim, caused the conductor, brakeman and station agent to grin knowingly, and the hurrying passenger who was making a change of cars to pause for a time in astonishment, but it had no particularly startling effect upon a lad of some eighteen years who was just stepping from the rear platform of the other train, valise in hand, and a good saturated look on his weathered face. He had evidently expected the salute, for his feet had not touched the boards before he waved his free hand to the row of bobbing heads and uttered an acknowledgment.

The occupant of the cheering made no other response than to flourish his arm again, and then went forward to the baggage car, in order to see if his traps were safe. He watched his trunk come rushing out upon the track, followed shortly afterwards by a long narrow box, and then, as if satisfied that his belongings were secure, he made his way across the platform to the motionless train and soon entered the car in which the applauding company were seated. He was gone too soon, for the instant he mounted the steps the train, which was an accommodation on a short side road, started off.

Duff Thornton's Grit.

By OWEN HACKETT.

WHEN Duff Thornton had nearly finished his Sophomore year at Columbia College, where he had been considerable of a swell, he suddenly found himself an orphan, with just four hundred dollars a year income, a lot of elegant clothes, several walking sticks and not a bit of the swell left, excepting some expensive tastes.

The swell college youth of the land appear to the outside world a very silly lot of empty heads indeed, and Duff was to all appearance not exactly according to pattern; occasionally one of them is, notwithstanding the outer finish, made of right good stuff; and Duff was that kind, with something of the original in him besides. And that is what makes him worth writing about.

When Corwalle Brierston, Esq., counselor at law and executor of his father's almost valueless estate, announced to Duff the result of his labors, the following conversation took place, the elderly lawyer leaning back in his office chair, fingering his gold rimmed eyeglasses and regarding Duff's fashionable habiliments with a sort of pitying contempt:

"This is something of a fall in the world, Mr. Thornton."

"Well, rather!" Duff had been prepared for it by the lawyer some time since, so that he was able to receive the final announcement calmly enough.

"True—no—mode of life will have to be changed materially."

"Well, I should say so; but it strikes me I've had my share. I've lived on the fat of the land ever since I could eat meat and—well, I guess I've enjoyed it more than I would if it came late in life, as it does to most people."

"If'm! very true!" and the elderly man of affairs resumed his easy attitude. "And what are you going to do—what pursuit are you going to follow?"

"Study law," replied Duff, without hesitation.

"Ah, yes! very good indeed. Er—with whom, may I ask?"

"Well, I've been counting on doing that with you, sir."

"Well, this is a cool blade!" thought the lawyer. As too Duff himself, he was too recently out of college to be aware that he was verging on the cheeky.

What Mr. Brierston said aloud was:

"Are you not aware, Mr. Thornton, that students in law offices receive no salary? And with your income of four—"

"Now, Mr. Brierston, it strikes me that is a big firm like this there ought to be some work I can do, if it's only office boy's work. If there is I'd like to have it and I propose to work hard enough and well enough to be paid for it."

The smile that lingered around the corners of the lawyer's firm mouth had no vestige of contempt in it now.

"Why do you choose the law?" he asked abruptly.

"Because I believe I'm cut out for that, if I am for anything."

The lawyer suddenly pulled out his watch and started on coining the time.

"You will have to excuse me now, Mr. Thornton, as I have a case on in the Supreme Court," and he rose and took his hat.

"You may report here at nine on Monday morning. We will arrange terms then. Good morning."

"There!" thought the lawyer as he hastened away. "I've given the young sprig a taste of his own abruptness."

Truth to tell, Duff was a little dumfounded at it; but that did not diminish his pleasure at the result of the interview.

During the late winter and spring he performed his duties in the office with zeal and intelligence, and earned many times over the ten dollars' salary he received; besides he studied assiduously at every spare moment and far into the night and grew pale and thin over it. All of which did not escape the eye of his preceptor.

One afternoon in the early summer when Mr. Brierston was away at Wauganasett, the quiet but fashionable seaside resort, Duff, laboring over his lawbooks was surprised by receiving a telegram, which read as follows:

TO THE CAVE!

A Tale of the Cumberland Mountains.

BY COLONEL ALEXANDER LEITCHMONT,
United States Forest Service.

CHAPTER I. ON THE POINT.

A BUSTY official sat in a lofty and gloomy office in one of the public buildings of Washington one morning during the early twenties. Half way to the door a heavy rail divided the room to keep intruders at a distance from the august presence.

The gilt inscription on the outer panels of the door notified the public that this was one of the offices of the United States Forest Service; but the word "private" underneath accounted for the fact that that door was never opened.

To reach the room where and buster apartments had to be traversed, and much red tape had to be unrolled before the unofficial visitor found himself within the holy of holies.

The head of the department was carefully perusing a paper that lay before him and frowning to himself as he read. Then he arose and went to a large map of the United States which hung on the wall and made a tracing with his finger while consulting the letter.

Returning to his desk he touched a bell, while he took up his notebook of assignments and turned the leaves rapidly.

"That is the man," said he to himself at last, and to the messenger who appeared in answer to his call he added:

"Is Crook outside?"

"I think so, sir."

"I want to see him."

The messenger disappeared, and drumming with his fingers impatiently on the document that had engaged his attention, the other awaited the advent of "the man."

He appeared—a thoughtful looking fellow, youngish in appearance, not very tall nor stout.

His movements were delicate, but two brown eyes moved very nimbly, and roamed with a direct and searching glance whenever they took to any object, as for instance, on the face of his superior and on the letter, when that official took it up and held it before him for reference. The quiet new comer was one of the agents of the Forest Service, men who were required to have the instincts of a ferret, a judgment as quick and sure as a lawyer's, and the courage of a lion.

This one did not stand on ceremony. He removed the basket of letters that lay on the chair beside the desk and took the seat with his eyes fastened on those of the head of the department.

"You will have to go to Lexington, Crook."

Crook said nothing, but waited for further light on the matter.

"Levell has been writing from time to time that he thought there was some moonshining being carried on somewhere between him and the Cumberland Mountains."

"Further back in the mountains, I should say."

"How's that? You know the country?"

"My first job took me there on a false alarm. I thought at the time it was an inviting place for the business."

"Well, then, so much the better. Levell can't handle it. You take it. I'll have his letters got out from the files in half an hour and you can get the facts. When can you start for Lexington?"

"I'm not sure it would be advisable to go there."

"HALT!" THE BOORISH CHIEFMAN LUNGED OUT AHEAD. "STAND BY!"

The Oakville Mystery.

By E. L. YOUNG.

CHAPTER I.

MOTHER AND SON.

IN a small house on a pretty country road a woman was lying in the last stages of consumption. By the side of the bed, his face buried in the pillows, a boy was kneeling, sobbing bitterly.

His mother, the best friend he had ever known, was dying, and, as he gazed upon the face he loved so well, he could tell even in his inexperience that the end was but a few hours distant at most.

The two had been there all the morning, and though the neighbors were passing the house at intervals, none stopped to inquire after the inmates.

The people of Oakville were not very sympathetic, and though they knew Mrs. Temple was extremely low, they could not conquer their prejudice toward the family sufficiently to render what little assistance might be needed to alleviate her suffering.

Dr. Tremont, however, was a kind hearted, generous man. He had been attending the invalid for weeks, though he knew his prospects of final reimbursement were exceedingly limited.

He had been a warm friend of Mr. Temple before his death, and, believing him to be an honest, trustworthy man, had stood by him through his trials, feeling a sincere sympathy for the sickly and destitute wife who had been left behind.

The doctor generally reached the Temple home about the middle of the day, and as it was now drawing toward that hour, young Melville expected his arrival each moment, hoping that he might be able to give some encouragement, yet feeling that the end was near.

At last a carriage stopped in front of the house, and Melville approached the window to behold Dr. Tremont just alighting. He went to the door to admit the physician, who asked as he entered:

"How is she today?"

"Worse," sadly replied the boy; "she scarcely notices anything going on around her."

The doctor made his way to the bedside, and, as he gazed upon the patient, shook his head sadly. His experienced eyes told him it would not be necessary to call again.

He prepared some medicine, and tried to speak a few words with the sufferer, but she was too weak to talk, and he turned to leave.

Melville followed him to the gate, and asked if there was any hope.

"No, my boy, there is none. Your mother cannot possibly live the day out. Is there no one you can get to come here and stay? It isn't safe for you to be here alone."

"I don't know of anybody," replied Melville, struggling hard to control his emotions.

He could remember the time in their prosperous days, before his father's death, when the townpeople were glad to be numbered among their acquaintances, but now, since adversity had descended upon the family, their friends had deserted them.

"Well," said the doctor, "I'll send Mrs. Remond up here at once; she'll come, I'm sure, if I request her to do so. And now, my dear boy, bear up manfully under this bitter experience, and remember that you have a true friend in me."

As the physician spoke, he placed his hand kindly on the boy's head for a moment, then got into his buggy and drove away.

With a heavy heart, Melville returned to the bedside of his dying mother, and, kneeling down, took one of her emaciated hands in his own, and brushed back the still luxuriant hair from her forehead.

At touch of his hand the woman opened her eyes, and, seeing him looking down so sadly upon her, smiled faintly, and whispered:

"Don't take it so to heart, Melville. I am ready and willing to go, and my only regret is in leaving you. You will have a hard life of it for a year or two, but always be a good boy, do right under all circumstances, and you will succeed in the end."

"The house and furniture will all have to go to pay my funeral expenses and the other debts we owe, so after I'm buried I want you to go to your aunt Evelyn and she will help you along. Tell

Our Fight for Our Camp.

BY LUCY, RALPH GREENWOOD.

IT was a hot chase. Frank and I were after a white tail deer in the mountains at the head of White River in northern Arizona.

We were cousins, and although boys of but sixteen (we were born within a few months of each other—I being the elder) we were by no means had woodsmen. For two years we had lived with a friend of my father's on a ranch in the valley of the White River, forty miles from where we were at the time of which I write.

We were on a little hunting trip. Mr. Garrard, our friend, used to say that we would never learn anything about raising cattle or sheep, we spent so much of our time in the woods, but we both knew very well that he was more than a little proud of our various adventures, and told every one he met about the two smart boys he had up on his ranch.

It do not mean to say that we were particularly smart, but we certainly did have the most surprising luck about getting into adventures and out of them.

We were after a good stand buck this morning. The important fellow was actually taking his morning drink of water within fifty feet of our camp when Frank woke up (I have always had an idea that Frank sleeps with one eye open) and saw him.

Frank could have knocked him over with one shot, but there was always a tacit agreement between us that we should show everything, so he generously woke me up.

Now, if Frank sleeps lightly I have the opposite faculty of sleeping so heavily that a regiment of cavalry could charge over me without waking me. Frank usually wakes me by yelling in my ear. He couldn't do that on this morning though, for fear of frightening the buck away, so he did what he thought would be the next best thing—he pushed me.

Naturally I awoke with a howl of pain, and the buck was three hundred yards away and climbing the wooded side of old Mount Baldy before I could grab my gun. We took quick aim and fired, but Frank was laughing and I was half asleep—and the buck scrambled out of sight a moment later.

"Wake up, old sleepy," shouted Frank, "and let's follow him."

"It's no use," I answered, "he's got a big start; we've got to get some breakfast and catch the horses, for we could never get near him on foot now, and before we can get ready to start he'll be miles away."

"Nonsense," said Frank, "you don't want to give up the only deer we've seen on this trip, do you? You saddle the horses while I put up some cold lunch, and we'll eat as we go. Besides I think I hit him."

When Frank says in his quiet way that he thinks he has hit anything in the line of game I have learned not to dispute the probability of it. Nine times out of ten I have found that he was right, so I ran quickly down to the green spot where our two horses were picketed and had them saddled (just as Frank had finished filling our canteens with fresh water and rolling up some cold meat and bread in a clean piece of deer skin).

A moment later we were galloping away with flushed faces and eager eyes. Frank was first at the spot where the deer stood when we fired.

"Look!" he said, pointing to a rock.

Sure enough there was a splash of blood on it, and beyond, in the direction the deer had taken, there was another and a larger one. Without another word being spoken we started in pursuit.

But we could not gallop now. In the first place we had to trail the deer, and in the second we had to climb the side of the mountain, or rather the spur of the mountain which in Arizona they call, from its general appearance a "hog back."

"When he gets to the top of that hog back," said Frank, "he'll keep on up. There's that plateau up there and the lake where you saw our getting drowned."

I remembered the plateau, also.

the danger I was in, but as that is another story I will not go into details now.

Up the mountain we went, and then up the gradually sloping hog back, making very good time, for the ground was soft and the trail easy.

As we approached the plateau we became more cautious. If his deerstep was weak he would probably balk on either one side of it or the other, and we would get a good shot, although it might be at long range.

Sure enough, as we came into the fringe of young trees at the edge of the plateau we saw his deerstep glancing back, in the frightened sort of way a deer always does, from the other side.

"Shall we take a shot?" I asked.

"I don't believe it's worth while from here,"

"IT'S AN INDIAN'S CAPTIVE," I CRIED.

How Highbrow Came to Grief.

BY GEORGE M. MANN.

OLD KORTLANDT was hard at work in the stable yard of "The Mansion" sponging the mud from the glancing spokes and leaving away like a contented lumberer, when he turned. Dick Brantley in his backboard behind the historic old Chariot—the experienced gelding with a patch eye.

"Hello, Brantley!" cried Dick, jumping down with a crack of his whip. "Couldn't go by without saying 'hello' to old friends."

"How do do? How do do?" returned old Brantley, keeping right on with his work. "Been away, huh? yes?"

"Yes, been to town."

"I heard 'em sayin' somewhere 'bout it, but I didn't bother. You got better down that way, I reckon?"

"Yes, I've been visiting one of my uncles."

"Aye?" returned Brantley with an air of indifference. "Got money, perhaps?"

"What? My uncle? Oh, he's very rich, I guess."

"That I remembered! Some one says 'em sayin' 'bout that, but I didn't mind."

"See, Brantley, here's the filly!"

"That's your 'come home' in that, but I just wanted, she's pretty fair."

"I was just looking for a chance to get on her and take a spin all the way back from town; but first thing I heard was that the new tenants had come in. That settles it, I suppose, particularly after what I saw last night. Say, Brantley, what kind of people are those Highbrows, any way?"

"Dunno; they must have a big crop of money to take such a place as this."

"Well, I was mighty glad to find that you and the filly had gone with the place. But about the people—that was their son I saw last evening, I suppose. I was a young fellow riding along behind the barouche near our place and I recognized the filly under him at a glance, you can bet. So I judged they were the new tenants here."

"Well, when I came up to our place a minute later, the carriage was well up the road, but the young fellow was putting the filly's head to her fence. The most awkward place to try to jump on—no run, you know, and pretty possessed to get off of with the soft dust under her feet."

"The filly was refusing, of course. What horse would jump in a place like that without a chance for a fair start? The young fellow was mad as hares, tugging at the bridle and giving her the whip in a way that showed he knew nothing about the handling of a horse; and she was so worked up and excited that I believe she would have cleared the fence in a minute in sheer desperation—which would have made pretty horse in our tramp patch."

"So I ran up and took hold of the bridle, for I was mad, I can tell you, so you the mare treated like that—and I asked his parents if he didn't know better than to do that way. Mad? Well, you ought to have seen him! He was actually going to give me the whip, but I'd turned the filly's head down the road and, just as he raised his hand, I gave her a whack on the flank and away she jumped. Say, Brantley, I hope these new ones more in the family like her. After my taste of the boy, I can't but think they're not very nice people."

"I dooms. They hadn't bothered me. I reckon they're all right—though some are worse, saying as how the hail of him do have pretty high old tempers. But 'tain't none of my business."

"Well, all I've got to say is—" what Dick told him. Once he had stopped in the street and played ball, being out as many minutes in that way. Mr. Tripp was obliged to confess that he never had a more satisfactory boy than Chester.

The store closed at noon, and when the stand of going into the house, walked over to Mrs. Rand's cottage.

Mr. Rand was surprised when she saw who her visitor was.

"Good evening, Mr. Tripp," she said politely. "Won't you come in?"

"Thank you, mother. It's rather late to call, but I thought you might like to hear about York, now" Chester is there."

"Have you been to New York today?"

"Yes, I went up on a little business."

"It seems likely to be permanent."

"Well, I guess I must be gone. If I should lose the place, but I will take this last any time."

"I don't think he would be wanted to come back to Wycombe after working in New York."

Miss Tripp returned to her home rather disappointed. He had told as sure of winning Chester's services, and now his old boy seemed to be quite out of his reach.

"Offered to send his mother five dollars a week!" he exclaimed. "Then he must be much as much as he is in his new place. Mr. Wallace didn't seem to know about it. I wonder what he can be doing to get such a high salary."

"Hello, Brantley!" cried Dick, jumping down with a crack of his whip. "Couldn't go by without saying 'hello' to old friends."

"How do do? how do do?" returned old Brantley, keeping right on with his work. "Been away, huh? yes?"

"Yes, been to town."

"I heard 'em sayin' somewhere 'bout it, but I didn't bother. You got better down that way, I reckon?"

"Yes, I've been visiting one of my uncles."

"That'll recommend him some one says 'em 'bout 'em 'bout that, but I don't mind."

"See, Brantley, hear the dilly?"

"That's your 'come back' in that, but I just wanted, eh? your dilly."

"Dunno; they must have a big crop of money to take such a place as this."

"Well, I was mighty glad to find that you and the dilly had gone with the place. But about the people—that was their son I saw last evening, I suppose. The Bonniewood Boys.

A STORY OF THE BORDER.

BY JOHN HART EDDY.

CHAPTER I.

THE FLIGHT TO THE POOL CREEK.

THE boys were over twenty miles from the ranch. Jim was standing a deer when he suddenly caught a glimpse of a painted face in a hemlock thicket.

"Hoo," he whispered to the other two, "there's an Indian in there, sure as guns."

The next instant an arrow came whirling between Bob and Sandy.

Instinctively Jim raised his rifle to his shoulder and fired. The arrow clattered away. The Indian was gone.

"The arrow was in his leg," declared Bob. "He's gone to get the whole pack on our trail, and you fellows ought to know by this time what that means. Remember the tale of the Bonniewood boys?"

"They were scalped, weren't they, Bob?" said Jim, with an irresponsible shudder.

"And howled at the stars like the hags," returned Bob. "I'm almost sorry you fired that shot, Jim."

"I did it in self defense, Bob. I reported as much as anything another arrow would come whizzing out of that thicket, one that would hit somebody this time."

"Oh, I'm not blaming you, Jim."

"Do you really think there are others around, Bob?" said Sandy.

Bob made no reply, but with a quiet movement of his hand motioned the others to follow him. He led them for a full half mile before he stopped, and then said in a low tone:

"We're in for it, and I only hope we get out alive. It has been an hour that the rascal will be in some communication with his tribe, and in two or three hours at the most they'll be on our trail."

"Well, let's get to the horses and fight out for the ranch as quick as we can," suggested Jim. "They can't catch us then."

"I agree that's the best thing we can do, Jim," said Bob. "But, Sandy, what's come over you? You're as quiet as a stone."

"Supposing the horses are gone; what then?"

"Why, Sandy, you're not getting crookier, are you? The horses will be all right. But, as you say, supposing they are gone? I must confess I don't know what we will do."

"I do, then," replied Sandy with a triumphant air. "The Pool Creek!"

"Yes, but can you find it?" asked Jim.

"I'm almost certain I can," replied Sandy. "and it's on the way to the ranch."

"Well, we'll try the horses first. Whatever we do must be done quickly. Come on." And as he spoke Bob started at a dog trot through the forest.

They soon reached the spot where their horses had been tethered, and to their dismay there was no sign of them. Even the blankets and their few cooking utensils had been taken.

toward the back, which was not more than fifty yards distant.

Arrived at the stream, which was from ten to fifteen feet in width and very shallow, Sandy stopped and said: "Which way is that wooded, up or down?"

Bob said up, Jim said down the stream.

"See both ways," suggested Sandy, "and the fellow that finds it, while the woodcock wait on the log. Then we'll join the lucky man "Who says I am, not a prophet?" observed Sandy, with a lofty air. "Didn't I have a premonition?"

"You are a remarkable man, Sandy, and we'll admire you still more if you take us to the cave by the safest route, and at the same time the quickest to lead the way."

"Fall in, single file, close order, Indian style. Eyes to the front and all around, ears open on both sides; no talking in the ranks; forward march!" and at this last order Sandy started at a swinging trot and tale to the water. "We don't want to leave any more trail than we can help."

There was no time to waste. Bob found the log, and when they were all there, started on it. Then Sandy, as leader, detailed his plan.

"We will take to the water, and keep to it single file till we reach a ledge of rocks jutting into the stream on the right; then we'll follow this ledge up to the canyon where Bob shot that bear. From the canyon to Pool Creek is only about a mile."

EXPLAINS THE MYSTERY.

"TODAY you don't think Frank is dead?"

"No, I don't. He has been the world famous "people's agent," and the life they led in New York would all make interesting reading, but would not help us much in finding out how they got to the far West, or how Jack's life was finally realized.

The boy's life became a mystery in the morning the latest, and showing possibly the latest. But Vernon was repeating on the train of the morning, and had been told of a boy's life and it might be worth the while to "know" him.

Franky was a fine boy, too, but it always seemed to be rather impetuous and sometimes would make of the life. He was probably the biggest of the boys. He joined in all the expeditions, the boys lived, but as an equal, at least had a name, being known as "Franky."

In appearance the three boys were exactly alike, but were not

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1892.

Phil Matthewson.

BY JAMES CLAYTON WHITE.

BACK in the hills that border the Hudson, and about thirty miles from New York, there is a curious little Dutch farmhouse of great antiquity. In which, several years ago, there lived two lone women.

One was old Mrs. Springer, aged sixty-nine, blind and almost deaf. The other was her daughter, Lavinia, a sharp, quick and rather well-to-do maid, who nevertheless had not a little of the softness of human kindness in her.

The old lady was a great hand at knitting, and her work was famous in the neighborhood. Lavinia raised their vegetables, raised, and raised the stock, and was very good at it. They had managed to "get along" and had even saved up a few dollars for a rainy day.

When some of the church people proposed to take in some poor, dry children, to be sent into the country under the auspices of one of the numerous Fresh Air Funds, their poverty did not prevent Lavinia from stepping forward and offering to board two of them.

"There ain't no reason on earth why I should do it," she replied to some suggestions. "They won't find anything—only work and, Lord knows, I'm used to that."

And when she told old Mrs. Springer of her resolve, the old lady smiled her head in approbation and, turning over the leaves of her raised letter Bible, read the story of the widow and the prophet that stuck with her; and they had no fear.

The children came—two boys, both from the city's streets—Phil Matthewson and Danny Bowles. They began on the porch which Lavinia declared, threw all the trash and rubbish of her past life into the shade for downright comfort.

The boys' personal appearance had been improved on starting from the city, but even in their short railway ride they had quickly attracted to themselves notices of dirt and grime.

"Fresh air!" cried Lavinia. "It's fresh water they need now!" and she proceeded to wash their hands and faces under the pump the minute they arrived.

She had some difficulty in doing this and suffered some slight contusions from the basin that tickled unpleasantly during the operation.

At last it was done.

"Now you can run along and play for an hour," said she. "Then dinner will be ready. Mind you keep out of my vegetable patch and don't you dare touch the apples. They're not near ripe yet, and you'll get your death of colic."

The boys looked bewildered. They showed no disposition to move.

"Why don't you go and play?" demanded Lavinia, turning at the door and seeing them standing where she left them, gazing about with a sort of awe, not mingled with fear.

Play! There were no streets here, no cars to climb on, no horse-cars to "hitch" on, no gutters to wade in.

They were in a strange, unknown scene, and Phil was wondering just then the first day he was allowed to go to Sunday school, and he felt more just about as embarrassed as he felt then.

But they found a welcomed spot under a big tree after a while, and sat down to rest in the shade.

"What kind of a racket is this, anyway?" inquired Phil indignantly, when they were settled.

"Don't know. It looks odd! That's too fresh, that's what I think," replied Lavinia, smiling at a humble boy with his hat.

THE ROAD ON SPARKLE.

"I DREAD to tell you the truth, my dear Paul, but I must do so," said Mrs. Green Manley to a fine looking boy of sixteen, whose hand she held in her own. "I dare not put it off any longer."

"For what, mother? What in the world has happened?" asked Paul, with a look of the most intense anxiety on his handsome face.

"Paul, I may die any day," said the lady impulsively.

"No, no, mother."

"Don't laugh at me, Paul, for I am very serious."

"You don't feel very well today, mother, and you may be better tomorrow. Don't say anything more about it now. Look at those clouds on the other side of the valley; they are like bits of lace," continued Paul, pointing to the mountains on the other side of the valley.

"The clouds in front of me are black, Paul, for I see trouble in the future for you," persisted Mrs. Manley.

"Wipe away those, mother," added Paul lightly.

"I wish you to be serious, my dear boy; don't trifle with me. I have something of the utmost importance to say to you, and perhaps I have already put it off too long," said the lady.

The building was not more than eight feet square, and was perched on the very summit of Sparkle, as Colonel Manley, the husband of the lady, had chosen to call it. The mountain on the other side of the valley was Fairview, which had

IN HARD LUCK.

BY HORTON McVILLEN.

PERHAPS it was only the darkness and the cold that made Joe feel cross, but even those things and more than usual on this Saturday morning.

There was little enough, to be sure, in his life or surroundings to make him cheerful. The dim light from a near court struggled in at the window. Looking out, grim walls were on every side—rooms like the one he lived in.

Pacing northward, only a sliver beam of sunlight ever came into his window—more while he was there. But this morning a dull November canopy of gray hung over the sky, and what light did struggle in at the dirty panes, made the uncarpeted, cheerless, furnished room look almost gloomy.

Joe finished his dressing without loss of time, buttoned his well worn coat tight about him and went out of the room. Mrs. McKelvey, his next door neighbor was drawing a tub of water from the sink in the hallway.

"Good morning, Mother Green," said she.

"Oh, good morning," replied Joe, who was so deep in his own melancholy thoughts that he might have passed on without noticing her.

"You're not early this morning," continued Mrs. McKelvey, trying to lift her heavy tub with a sort of groan.

"Here, I'll carry it to for you," said Joe, and he lifted the tub like a feather and carried it into the McKelvey apartment, the only light room of which was here filled with wash tubs.

"You're very polite, that you are," exclaimed Mrs. McKelvey. "an' I'm obliged to you; but me back is nearly broke—an' then a rubbin' at the tub since six be the clock."

Joe glanced at the family timepiece on the mantel and saw it was ten. He was not due at work until twelve, so there was no hurry.

"Ah," sighed the woman, "if me little Jerry were only a little stronger, but like yourself now! Mary's the same I seen 'em a hole in me person an' 'tough' of 'em grown' up a beauty of a b'y an' helps his old mother a-washin' the wash an' such like."

"How did he become lame?" asked Joe, who somehow felt a little less lonely as the old woman chatted on.

"May the saints forgive him, but 'twas the cold moon what did it. He hev' the corns o' run on 'em, an' ye may know well enough, 'twas on the same there."

"There, don't you go now 'telling me a week, an' he was that filled with 'tough' he couldn't stand at all. He fell over the blessed devil's a cousin' to 'em on the floor an' broke his leg. An' it was never mended right, I telled."

"Here's a better man than I ever lived, 'twas when he do get wild with the drink. Sure I'm always in a titbit, but there be no knowin' when he'll take a short an' there's no stoppin' 'em when he do get upon."

And Mrs. McKelvey plunged into the wash with all the strength of her weary arms and with many a shake of her grizzled head.

Joe stopped at the coffee stand on the corner a

"Hello, Smiley? Fire an' out a cup o' coffee, will you, an' don't be a shabby wid der sugar. Hello, Joe! dat you? It's so cold, me eyes is froze together."

"Hello, Jerry! Hold out no more!"

"Yep! I've sold them. My 'but ain't dat good."

THE STAIRS WERE BREAKING UP THE STAIRS WERE ON THE HILL.

He had taken a big gulp, wholly regardless of the steaming heat of the mixture called coffee. "Say, have another wid me, Joe. I've drunk."

"No, I've got all I want," said Joe. "I'm off to work."

"Say! I've got the shoulder, the shoulder!"

"Yes; ain't all right."

"Come! I wish she didn't have to work so hard! I will her she won't last till I get with dat boy. Well, nothing. Be good to yourself."

Here was the little fellow as lively as a cricket and yet he had a hard enough lot, thought Joe. Why couldn't he leave up and take life cheerfully, too?

Perhaps he might if he had a mother to help like Jerry McKelvey. But there he was, alone in the world, without a relative or a friend, not even with an acquaintance whom he really liked or cared to be with.

BY JOHN WARDLAW.

"M.A." said Sam Lowry at breakfast, "when are we going to the fair?"

Mr. Lowry, senior, was vigorously occupying a breakfast table at Sam's elbow, but it was not he to whom that momentous question was usually referred.

"Fair? What fair?" demanded Mrs. Lowry with an air that said as plain as could be that such trivial questions as these were altogether too unimportant to attract her notice.

"Why, what if you didn't know? I mean the county fair at Headbourn, of course. It opens to-day. They say it's going to be a big thing. They're going to have horse racing."

"For the land's sake! Horse racing, eh? Now,

I call that a pretty thing to set before the youth of the land, leading to betting and gambling and worse."

"Well, there's the fancy work and essay call show. Everybody—"

"Hamp! And they are supposed to give prizes for that sort of thing, I reckon, just as they did when I was a girl and lived over in Lonsome County. Every year we used to work a sampler, just as far back as I can remember; and how many prizes do you think she got? Not one! I know 'em."

"Well, there's the cake and pie exhibit." Sam made haste to get in, for his mother was a great hand at such things, and would not allow that she had a close competitor in the whole village.

"Don't you mention such things before me," exclaimed Mrs. Lowry with some asperity. "You recollect, father, that fancy cake I sent to the fair when we were keeping company. It was all covered with the most beautiful frosting in a diamond shaped oblong pattern, with the angel Gabriel made out of white sugar standing in the middle, blowing a gold horn—made of all paper, and just too cute for anything."

"Yes, I remember it, I'm sure, but it wasn't up to what you can do now."

"You loved it was the silliest thing you ever ate, and so did everybody else. And what do they do? Give the prize to a little child nine years old?"

Whereat Mrs. Lowry sits back and looks around as if she were calling upon the world at large to witness the absurdity.

"Well, then, there's a—oh, baby show!" cries Sam in a heroic effort to find something that will suit.

"Baby show? Bah!" No, this was too much.

CHAPTER I.

THEY AND HIS TRAMPERS.

"COMES here, you do?"
These words were spoken in a stern voice by Jacob Winter and emphasized by a heavy frown. The speaker was rather an elderly man, with a rugged, weather-beaten face. He had seen but fifty years, though his wrinkles and hoarse shoulders indicated ten more.

The boy addressed had a bright, intelligent face and a cheerful look. Ben Bruce detected the danger signals in the tone and face of his step-father, but without a sign of hesitation he walked up to the former, and responded, "Here I am, sir."

The man seemed asking to lay hold of the fearless boy, but something in his countenance took up power to deter him.

"Ain't you ashamed of yourself, sir?" exploded Jacob Winter.

"Please let me know what I am to be ashamed of, Mr. Winter."

"Is it you didn't know," ejaculated Jacob.

"I don't know."

"Then I'll tell you. Yesterday when I was away drink your mother to the water under two tramps came to the door, and you took it upon yourself to give 'em a loaf of bread and a pint of milk. Darn it, if you dare!"

"I don't deny it," answered Ben boldly.

"You dare?"

"No, why should I?"

"That's the way my substance is wasted on the children and uncleanliness!"

"Mr. Winter, the two tramps, as you call them, were hungry, cold, and miserable. The man looked as if he had just got up from a fit of sickness. The boy was about ten and looked pale and dejected. Wouldn't you have given them something if you had been in my place?"

"No, I wouldn't," snarled Jacob.

"Then it seems to me you are the one that ought to feel ashamed."

"What! What!" gasped Jacob, aghast. "You dare to stand there, Benjamin Bruce, and tell me
